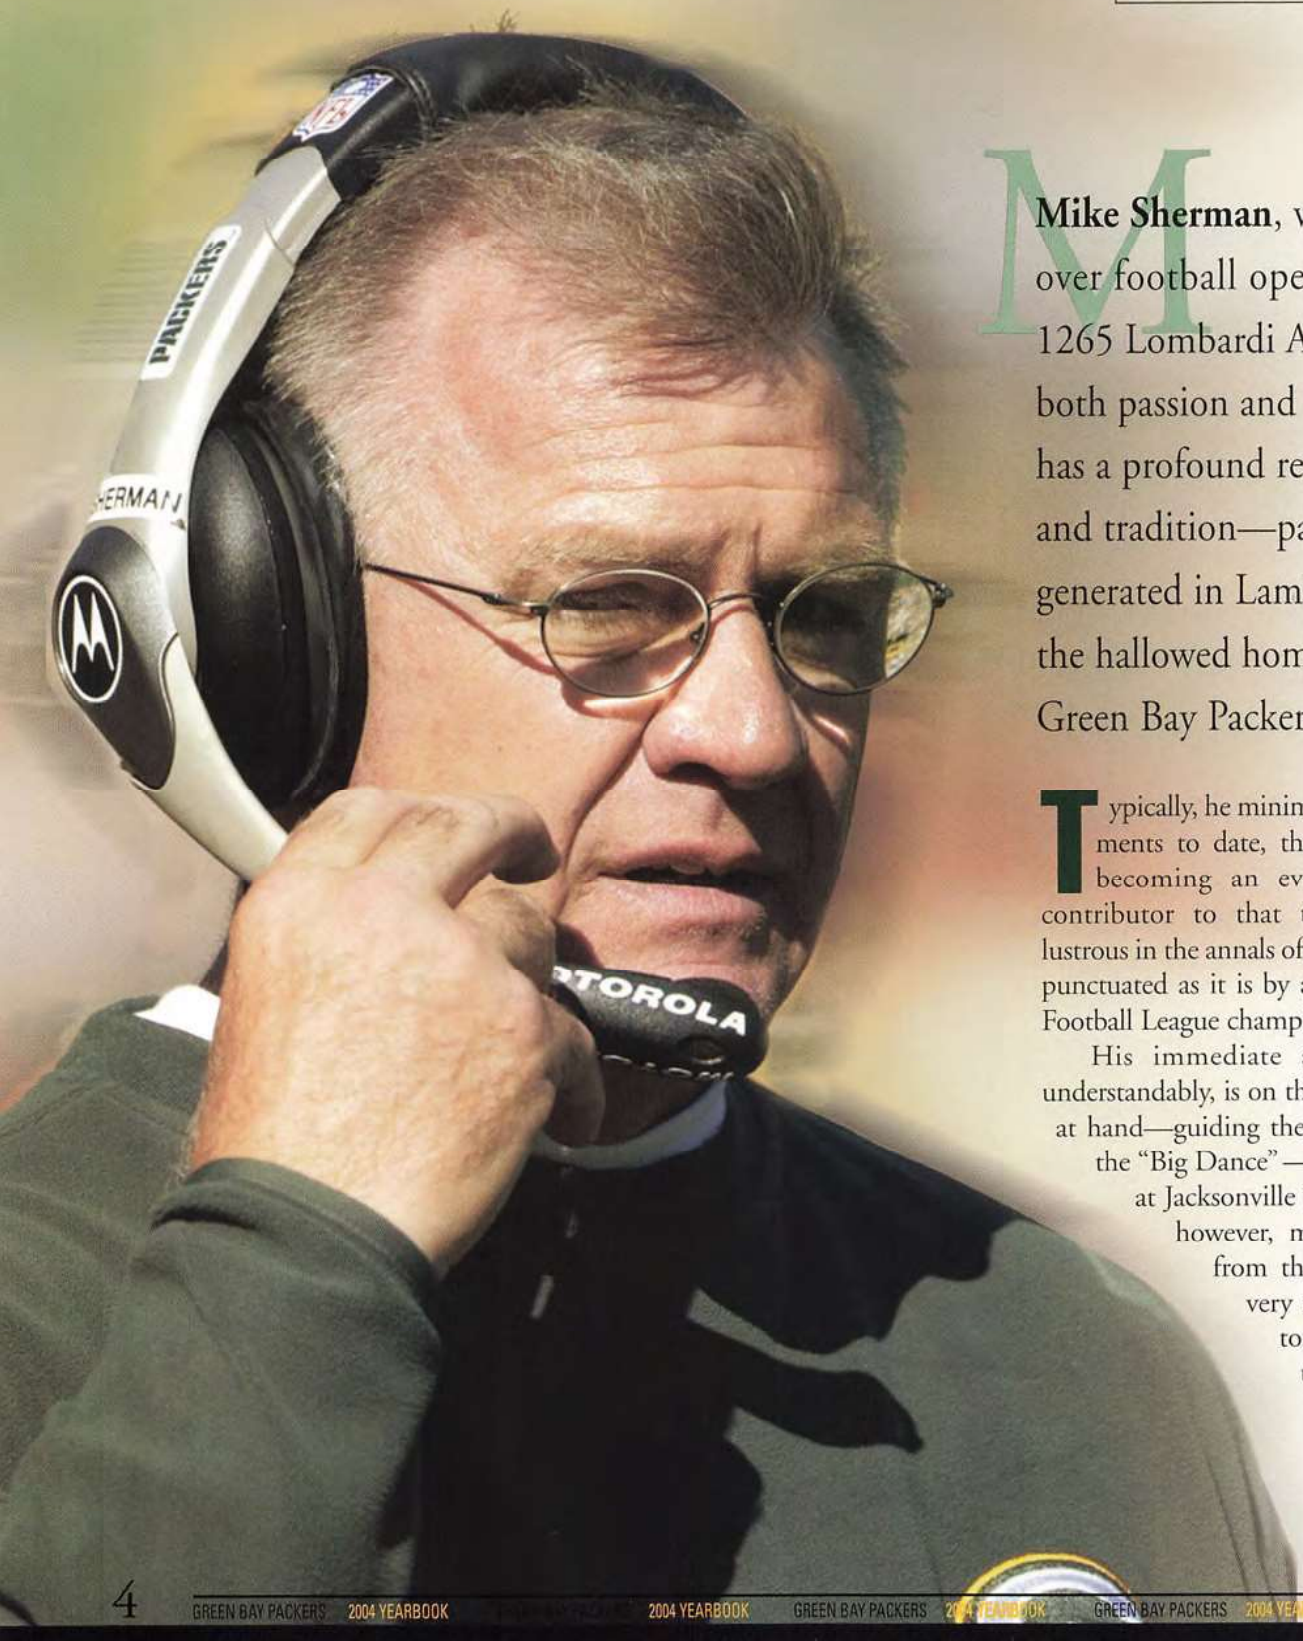
HISTORY-MAKING

Mike Sherman

"I LIKE OUR OPPORTUNITIES!"

▶ By Lee Remmel, Editorial Director



Mike Sherman, who presides over football operations at 1265 Lombardi Avenue with both passion and high purpose, has a profound respect for history and tradition—particularly that generated in Lambeau Field, the hallowed home of the Green Bay Packers.

Typically, he minimizes his own achievements to date, though he annually is becoming an ever-more significant contributor to that tradition, the most lustrous in the annals of professional football, punctuated as it is by a record 12 National Football League championships.

His immediate and central focus, understandably, is on the imposing challenge at hand—guiding the Green and Gold to the "Big Dance" — Super Bowl XXXIX at Jacksonville in February. He will, however, make Packers history from the season's start—the very moment he steps on to the practice field for the opening of 2004's training camp.

The thoroughgoing New Englander, who has led Green Bay to back-to-back NFC North Division championships the past two years, thus will become only the fifth man in the team's 84-year NFL history to coach the Green and Gold for a fifth season, joining an elite foursome—team founder E. L. "Curly" Lambeau, Vince Lombardi, Bart Starr and Mike Holmgren.

Sherman, having already entrenched himself in Packers history by winning more games in his first four seasons than any other head coach in team annals, acknowledges, "It does mean an awful lot to me to be the head coach of the Green Bay Packers—and going into my fifth season to be linked in any remote way to that exclusive group is very special to me.

"But, honestly, my sights are set on tomorrow's accomplishments," he said, quickly addressing his immediate priorities, "the accomplishments of this season and seasons to come."

A prime and perennial example of positive thinking, he is enthusiastic about the challenge just ahead.

"I like our opportunities," Sherman asserted. "I'm excited about the men we have in the locker room... both as players and as people.

"And I feel, if we can pick up where we left off last year and build upon that going into the 2004 season, it should be an exciting year for us. I don't think there's a player or coach in that locker room that is not looking forward with great anticipation to the season."

Elaborating on this theme, Sherman confided, "I felt, during the second half of last season, that our team came together. They successfully fought through the adversity of a 3-and-4 start. I've always said that adversity can bring out the best or the worst in you. If you have good people on your team they will respond to the challenge of adversity and the 2003 Green Bay Packer team did that. Adversity brings out the best in people if you have the best people doing the job, and we did last season. As I said, we started off 3-and-4 and we finished up the regular season winning 7 out of 9. I really felt like we were really clicking going into the playoffs.

"We had a tremendously emotional playoff win here (over Seattle) at Lambeau Field, and a very disappointing loss to Philadelphia, which everyone in the locker room after the game—including me—felt we could have and should have won... But we didn't.

"That certainly has incited in each one of us a hunger to go out there and get over that hump, so to speak, and go further in the playoffs and to the Super Bowl. That's our mission this year and those are the necessary strides we have to accomplish... to make gains from last year."

Sherman is equally positive about a major change he has made in the coaching staff, one which has found former Assistant. Head Coach Bob Slowik—who had been doubling as defensive backfield coach—being promoted to defensive coordinator, a role he previously had filled for both the Chicago Bears and Cleveland Browns.

Pleased to report that he already had seen impressive progress in that area, Sherman said, "Coming out of the minicamps, I feel like our players have been learning the defense at a very fast pace, and I think that's a direct reflection of the teaching Coach Slowik and the defensive staff have implemented in getting our players on pace."

Having said that, he pointed out, "We're a very young football team... We only have 4 players on the entire team in the "Over 30 Club" and they are all on offense. So trying to facilitate that learning curve with great teaching certainly is a priority for us going into the season. I think, at this point, that's been accomplished."

The assumption has been, it was interposed, that there will be a more aggressive approach defensively.

"I think every head coach and defensive coordinator wants their defense to be an aggressive defense," Sherman readily acknowledged, "and aggressiveness doesn't necessarily come with pressure and blitzing, all the time. You can be aggressive within a zone concept by how you play your position and the physical and aggressive attitude you take to the field as a player. I don't think there's a head coach out there that doesn't want an aggressive defense and I'm certainly included in that."

The Packers coach conceded it was a unit that had profited by the in-season additions of such as defensive linemen Grady Jackson, Larry Smith and defensive back Michael Hawthorne in 2003—and that he is counting on more of the same from this trio.

"I believe those men came in and impacted our defense at a time when we needed some help," he said, "and hopefully we can just build upon that this year."

Sherman also is hopeful that cornerback Chris Johnson, reputedly the fastest player in the entire 2003 draft, will be able to contribute to the cause after spending last season on injured reserve in the wake of a season-ending knee injury suffered in a practice-field collision with wide receiver Donald Driver August 18.

"I thought last year, coming out of the minicamps during the preseason, up until the time that Chris got injured, he was really making tremendous strides at becoming a quality corner," he said. "Now, he didn't have the opportunity to have a season behind him. He got injured and he has rehabbed since then, and he's still not one hundred percent but he is getting closer and closer each day and, certainly, the summer prior to our time in camp hopefully will bode well for him in regard to what impact he will have with us this season."

Well aware that how things will line up in the secondary depends to some extent upon whether veteran Mike McKenzie elects to return to Lambeau Field, Sherman voiced both a positive and a practical position on this continuing concern.

"Mike has been a part of a lot of victories and is an excellent player," he said, "but I feel that if need be, we're in a position with our younger players and rookies to be able to hold down the position that Mike held for five years if Mike chooses to be absent. They've worked extremely hard this off-season in preparation to play this year, so they just need to go out and play. I'd like to get Mike back but we will win with him or without him."

Addressing what contributions top draft picks Ahmad Carroll and Joey Thomas might make to the secondary in this connection, Sherman replied, "They're both young players and have a lot to learn, but they're both very athletic and skilled at their position, and have taken to the coaching that Kurt Schottenheimer and Lionel Washington have offered them. So I see them being a part of our defense very early.

"But, again, Ahmad is a very young player and has a lot to learn, and Joey Thomas as well, coming out of a smaller college (Montana State). But I do feel that they have the ability to do what we're going to ask them to do... and that's tight 'man' coverage challenging wide receivers. And in our division, that is quite a challenge with the quality receivers we will line up against."

Sherman also is openly pleased by what he sees elsewhere on the evolving defensive unit.

"I definitely believe that Nick Barnett will be a more dominant player and an evolving leader on our defense," he said of last year's first round draft pick, an NFL all-rookie selection.

"He has had very productive minicamp work and, going into the preseason, he's a man on a mission as well and looking forward to this season and making a significant contribution.

"Some indecision that he might have had last season in a position that was relatively new to him is no longer there. And he is extremely sudden, and he plays with great effort and tenacity, so I'm anxious to see him play. I can't wait to see the first defensive snap and watch him chase people down."

Expanding his scope, the Packers coach expressed growing satisfaction with his linebacker corps as a unit.

"Last year, going into the season, we revamped the linebacker position," he pointed out by way of preface. "(Na'il) Diggs moved from the 'buck' (strong) linebacker, which is the 'strong' linebacker, to the 'will' ('weak.') Hannibal Navies, who had been a will linebacker, we moved to the buck linebacker. And then Barnett, who had been a will linebacker and a defensive back in college, was now playing our 'mike,' so we had three critical position changes on our defense. And these three players evolved throughout the course of the season to a point where I now believe that our linebackers—particularly our three starters—will be one of the strengths of our defense."

Sherman also has abundant reason to take comfort in the outlook on the other side of the football, having presided over a record-breaking running attack last season as a formidable complement to an ever-potent passing game with Brett Favre under center.

"I was very pleased that we were able to run the football as effectively and consistently as we did, and as consistently as we were able to do," he acknowledged. "Certainly, to be recognized as the top running team in Packer history is no small accomplishment, by any stretch of the imagination. I was pleased with the physical dimension our offense displayed.

"But philosophically, I really want to do whatever we have to do to win football games. I was equally proud that Brett threw for 32 touchdowns and we led the league again in that area. So I feel like there's balance there. You want to avoid being one-dimensional and I believe we display great balance in our philosophy and scheme.

"Even if people perceive us as a run-first offense, I believe we have the necessary balance because of Number 4 at quarterback, and the quality receivers we have that will make the big catch and so I feel like we're very balanced. Whichever way it ends up—as long as we're winning football games—I'm happy."

Noting Ahman Green's imposing contributions to that process, his 2003 efforts punctuated by rushing for a club record 1,883 yards, Sherman asserted, "Ahman Green has evolved as not only a great runner in Packer annals as well as in the league, but he is also an experienced offensive threat as a receiver. I believe he is one of the best 'screen play' backs in football... He has turned many a short screen pass into big gains, utilizing the skill of his athletic offensive linemen in that process."

Unlike many of the faithful, who have expressed concern that Favre might be pondering retirement in the near future, Sherman is confident that his incomparable field general will be around.

"When you watch Brett practice, and you watch him play, and you see the enthusiasm he has for this game of football and for the Green Bay Packers, he hasn't displayed any diminished passion or ability at any time," Sherman asserted, "and as long as he continues to demonstrate that enthusiasm and that ability that defines him as a quarterback, and also the consistency that has made him the winningest quarterback in the National Football League today, I think he'll keep playing.

"I think if there comes a time when he can't perform at the level he thinks typifies the level of play for Brett Favre, I'm sure he'll be the first to know. But that time isn't now and I don't see it in the immediate future."

Addressing the future at the position with respect to the addition of former Cleveland Brown Tim Couch, Sherman observed, "Tim Couch was good enough five years ago to be the top player selected in the NFL draft and he is good enough today to bring quality, depth, talent and NFL experience to our quarterback position. It took a while to get him on board, but I'm glad we finally did. I am anxious to see him perform in the preseason."

Sherman will head into training camp with two new assistants on offense—veteran Johnny Roland as offensive backfield coach and James Campen, the team's starting center in the early '90s, as assistant offensive line coach—and returning Joe Philbin in an expanded role.

"The true test of any staff is its ability to handle the ups and downs once you go through the season together," Sherman said, "but at this point, Johnny brings a tremendous amount of experience, both as a player and as a coach in this league, and he has been around some special players and teams, so I'm excited to get his experience on our football staff. He replaces Sylvester Croom, who did a tremendous job for us as well. So he has big shoes to fill, but Johnny's more than capable of doing that.

"James Campen, having been a former Packers player, knows more than any of our coaches about the Green and Gold uniform since he put it on for 5 seasons with the Packers. He will assist Offensive Line Coach Larry Beightol as well as work in quality control.

"Joe Philbin has been working with Larry Beightol and really has been blossoming as an assistant coach on the staff, and giving him the tight end position will give him more opportunity to be more included in the passing game as well as the run game—and still have connection with the offensive line when the tight ends and tackles work together in our run game."

Turning again to the defensive side of the football, Sherman noted, "Kurt Schottenheimer (new defensive backs coach) adds quality and talent to our very experienced defensive staff… he's an excellent communicator."

Addressing the other off-season addition to his staff, the Packers' field leader explained, "When Stan Drayton left to coach wide receivers at Mississippi State with Sylvester Croom, he was the second quality control coach who left to go coach in college… and that's fine because that's what he wanted to do because of his career goals.

"I decided to go in another direction and consolidate that position by naming Vince Tobin a special assistant. Vince has done all anyone could do—been a head coach, defensive coordinator—his only motivation is to win and that's what I like about him as well as his talent and experience as a coach."

Best of luck this season!

In the special teams area, Sherman assures he will have no concerns whenever there is a need for the Green and Gold to acquire three points, with the team's all-time leading scorer, Ryan Longwell, back for an eighth season..

"Ryan (Longwell) is Mr. Consistency in regard go kicking field goals and extra points," he confidently observed, adding, "it is a great joy to have someone on the team that you know can do his job as consistently as Ryan. Obviously, in Lambeau Field—the place where other people have struggled, I pretty much know that we have three points when he say is he can make it. Offensively, we're trying to get seven, but if we don't, we still have Ryan to get us those valuable three points. And it's a great comfort that he's going to be there to do that… He's a winner."

Sherman noted that a somewhat different situation prevails at the other kicking position, where rookie B. J. Sander, a third round draft choice and winner of last season's "Ray Guy Award" as the nation's leading collegiate punter, is the apparent front runner to replace the departed Josh Bidwell.

"We have a lot of competition at the punting position going into camp, and that's a good thing because—at that position—you really have to be on the edge every day, competing and trying to win—as a kicker, as a punter," he said. "And Sander has done a nice job competing, coming out of college.

"A left-footed punter, he has a great drop… drops the ball extremely well to his foot—he's demonstrated consistency that way. Obviously, he's going have to get used to Lambeau Field and the wind and the weather elements that we deal with. But, having come from Ohio State, having kicked in the Midwest, he's familiar with a lot of these elements already, which obviously helps his situation."

From the overall perspective, Sherman is convinced that his team will forge into the season without any residual effects of that season-ending, overtime loss to the Eagles in the divisional playoff showdown at Philadelphia last January.

"Certainly, that was a disappointing loss," he affirmed, "particularly, in retrospect, because we felt that it was a game we could have won. And that was difficult for me to deal with and I'm sure for the staff and the players to deal with, as well.

"In spite of that disappointment, however, there were many great accomplishments during the season that presented many challenges... One in particular comes to mind—winning the division after having been 3 back in the standings at the bye. Disappointed about the Philadelphia loss certainly, but very proud of the way the team fought back, particularly in the second half of the season.

"But, I do believe that, with that loss, came a belief that 'we can do this' and that we are now possibly hungrier than we've ever been in regard to winning a championship here in Green Bay.

"So, yes, the loss was a negative, but the positives—the rippling effect of that loss, I think—will be played out this season with the hunger and the passion that our guys will play with."

Although he is the first head coach in Green Bay's distinguished history to win 40 games in his first four seasons, success which has seen him lead the Packers to four consecutive winning seasons and three consecutive playoff appearances, Sherman assured, "I really don't dwell on what we've done.

"I'm really focused on what we're going to do in the future. You know, this franchise has tremendous history and to be a part of it is really special. But I want to be a part of this franchise and be remembered for championship seasons as well as winning football games."

Though he had no head-coaching experience prior to taking over in 2000 as the 13th head coach in Packers history, Sherman said his ability to establish an impressive pattern of success has not come as a surprise to him.

"I've always been fairly confident in my ability to grind through the process, so to speak, and get the job done," he said. "And so it doesn't necessarily surprise me, although we have a lot more work to do before the job is done... and that's what this season is all about."

"I like our opportunities. I'm excited about the men we have in the locker room... both as players and as people." –Mike Sherman

Now in his fourth year in his demanding dual responsibilities as the organization's head coach and general manager, Sherman affirms, "I'm very comfortable with both roles. I don't look at them as different jobs because there's just one goal and that is to win football games.

"I'm fortunate," he added. "I'm blessed that I have a great coaching staff and a great personnel staff. And they are people that I trust and confide in, and they are very helpful to me. And I would never assume to be able to do this job all by myself because I definitely believe that your are only as good as those people around you—and I've surrounded myself with good people. So I feel very confident."

Not only in himself, but in the outlook for the season at hand.

"As I've said before, we are a young football team," Sherman reiterated, "but I believe if we can pick up where we left off last season, tweak some things here and there, and come out of the of this season hungry, I believe we can accomplish great things.

"The key to any successful football team is obviously talent, but the attitude of that talent is so critical. Last season, we had men who were tremendously unselfish. We had players who legitimately cared for their teammates both on and off the field. We had a cohesive locker room and an excellent work ethic. These characteristics when combined with talent can propel us toward our high expectations."

Despite his necessary preoccupation with the Packers and their artistic fortunes, Sherman somehow makes time to track the athletic endeavors of his offspring.

"Both of my sons (Matthew, 15, and Benjamin, 11) play football, he said, dryly appending, "They also think they can coach, too, judging from their comments to me after Packer games. I love going to watch them play and practice. To see these kids enthusiastically running around and having a great time playing football keeps me in touch with the 'game' and how it should be played even though it is our livelihood."

For the head of the house, it may be year five as head coach of the Green and Gold, but, he assured, the role is hardly "old hat" for Michael Francis Sherman, whose respect and affection for the storied franchise is readily apparent.

"I can't wait to get in the office and start each day," he says. "Although no outside motivation is necessary to do this job, there certainly is plenty to remind you of the task at hand just driving to work down Lombardi Avenue, seeing Lambeau Field as you approach Oneida Street or taking Holmgren Way during the day to get a cup of coffee.

"Also, there are very few organizations where you come to work every day and everyone is on the same page as you are—everyone in the Packer organization works toward the same goal and that is a credit to Bob Harlan and his leadership."

Offensive Line

TRIGGERS RECORD-BREAKING RUNNING GAME

▶ By Rob Reischel, Packer Plus/Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Larry Beightol has been coaching football 36 years. In that time, the Green Bay Packers offensive line coach has seen virtually anything and everything.

But the 2003 campaign provided Beightol with a new — and extremely pleasurable — experience.

"In all my years, I have never been with an offensive line that played as well as our guys did last year," said Beightol, who has directed offensive lines in all but eight seasons. "Never. We did so many things well. And the results spoke for themselves."

Did they ever. While Green Bay had outstanding skill players all over the field, their lives were made a lot easier by arguably the NFL's best offensive line.

Right guard Marco Rivera and center Mike Flanagan both were named to the Pro Bowl. Left tackle Chad Clifton and right tackle Mark Tauscher came back with gusto from career-threatening injuries. And although left guard Mike Wahle didn't receive a great deal of postseason fanfare, he may have had the best year of anybody.

This Fab Five played an enormous role in helping the Green Bay's offense become the first in league history to accomplish all of the following:

- rush for at least 2,500 yards
- pass for at least 3,300 yards
- complete at least 65% of its passes
- rush for 18 at least 18 touchdowns
- and pass for at least 32 touchdowns

"When you look at the numbers, you're like 'Wow! That's pretty impressive,' " Rivera said. "And the good thing is, we've got everybody back.

"We've got the fullbacks, the running backs, our quarterbacks, our receivers. Everybody's better. Can we still get better? There's that old saying that you never stay the same. You get better or you get worse. This year, we want to get better."

Considering the bar has been raised higher than the Sears Tower, that would be some accomplishment.

Last season, Green Bay set a new franchise record with 2,558 rushing yards. While Baltimore (2,629) and Denver (2,629) had more rushing yards, the Packers' total was the fifth-best in the NFL since 1987.

Ahman Green's 1,883 yards shattered Jim Taylor's single-season franchise rushing record set 41 years earlier. Green broke the single-game rushing mark on two occasions and his 20 touchdowns set a new Packer record. As a team, Green Bay averaged 5.05 yards per carry, the best in Packer history and the No. 2 mark in the NFL.

Quarterback Brett Favre tied the NFL record by leading the league in touchdown passes for a fourth time (32). And Favre's completion percentage of 65.4 topped his previous franchise record of 64.1% in 1992.

In addition, Favre was sacked just 19 times, a new franchise low during a 16-game season. And the Packers' allowed just one sack every 24.9 pass plays, the fifth-best percentage in the league.

That heady list helped Green Bay rank fourth in the NFL in scoring (27.63) and fourth in the league in total offense (362.4 yards per game). And the Packers know without their sensational offensive line, the aforementioned accomplishments would have never taken place.

"Those guys made everything possible for the rest of us," Green said. "There's not a line out there I'd rather run behind."

According to Beightol, the 32-year-old Rivera was the best of the brilliant bunch. The unit's elder statesman didn't allow a sack, showed surprising athleticism pulling on Green Bay's patented counter plays and was named to his second straight Pro Bowl — this time as a starter.

In addition, Rivera added to his growing legacy as one of the toughest all-time Packers, playing through a sprained medial collateral ligament and bleeding in his eye.

Flanagan, who the Packers tried trading at one time to Carolina only to have him fail his physical, failed at very little in 2003. And when Chicago's Olin Kruetz backed out of the Pro Bowl due to injury, Flanagan got the call.

Despite standing 6-foot-5 — a couple inches taller than most centers — and weighing just 297 pounds, Flanagan survives the battles inside due to tremendous leverage. And his athleticism at the position is virtually unmatched, making him a force on screens, sweeps and counters. In 2003, he allowed just three pressures and zero sacks.

The best athlete of the bunch, though, is Wahle, who enjoyed his best year as a Packer. According to Beightol, Wahle allowed just two pressures and 1 1/2 sacks, and his ability to get out and pull made Green Bay's 'Power O' play go all season.

Wahle was an All-Pro selection by Sports Illustrated. But the fact he wasn't even recognized as a Pro Bowl alternate left several of his teammates and coaches extremely miffed.

"I think people don't realize the kind of player that he is," Beightol said of Wahle. "He means an awful lot to us. He is a tough, hard-nosed competitor and he had an outstanding year for us. I'm disappointed that he didn't get selected. I know all of them can't be taken to the Pro Bowl, but I thought he certainly performed like a Pro Bowl player."

Both Clifton and Tauscher had Pro Bowl comebacks.

Clifton had his 2002 campaign ended when a blindside hit by Warren Sapp shattered his pelvis. In 2003, though, he played in all 1,031 snaps, allowed just two pressures and 1/2-sack. And in the off-season, he got a nifty new six-year, $32.35 million deal.

Tauscher returned from a torn ACL that he suffered in the second game of 2002 and played all but six snaps. While Tauscher admitted late in the season he never was quite 100%, his play was close, as he allowed just four pressures and 1 1/2 sacks all year.

"From top to bottom, those guys were tremendous and I thought they did a lot of things well," Beightol said of his unit. "No. 1, the run blocking was much more consistent than it had been in past years.

"They took a lot of pride in protecting the quarterback. They wanted to keep Brett as clean as they possibly could. I don't know which one they did the best. They were outstanding at both."

One twist that gave the running game an enormous boost was the addition of Kevin Barry as a sixth offensive lineman. For 15-20 snaps a game, the 6-foot-4, 330-pound Barry lined up to Tauscher's right in what was titled Green Bay's jumbo package. And almost without fail, the Packers would run in that direction.

The play was called 'U-Bacon', named for Barry's favorite food. And even though the opponent could predict exactly what was coming, they couldn't stop it.

The play became a force in short yardage and goal line situations. And Barry became a weapon foes had no answer for.

"Oh, that was fun. I had a good time with it," Barry said of his role. "Not only did we have the success we did, it also gave me a chance to get out there on the field and just play. It was good for me and the team.

"Teams are going to attack us differently than they did last year. But I feel if we work as hard and mix it up a little bit, we can do it again."

Can the Packers do it again offensively? With the starting offensive line intact for a fourth straight year, Green in his prime, Favre still operating at a Pro Bowl level and the emergence of a young receiving corps, the Packers don't see why not. In fact, they believe 2004 could be even better.

"I don't see any reason we can't do it again," Wahle said. "We're going to have all our guys back. Everybody's got another year in the system and we don't have anybody that's getting so old they can't perform. We're not in that position, obviously. So I think we can keep getting better and better."

Better than 2003? Now that's a frightening thought for the rest of the NFL.

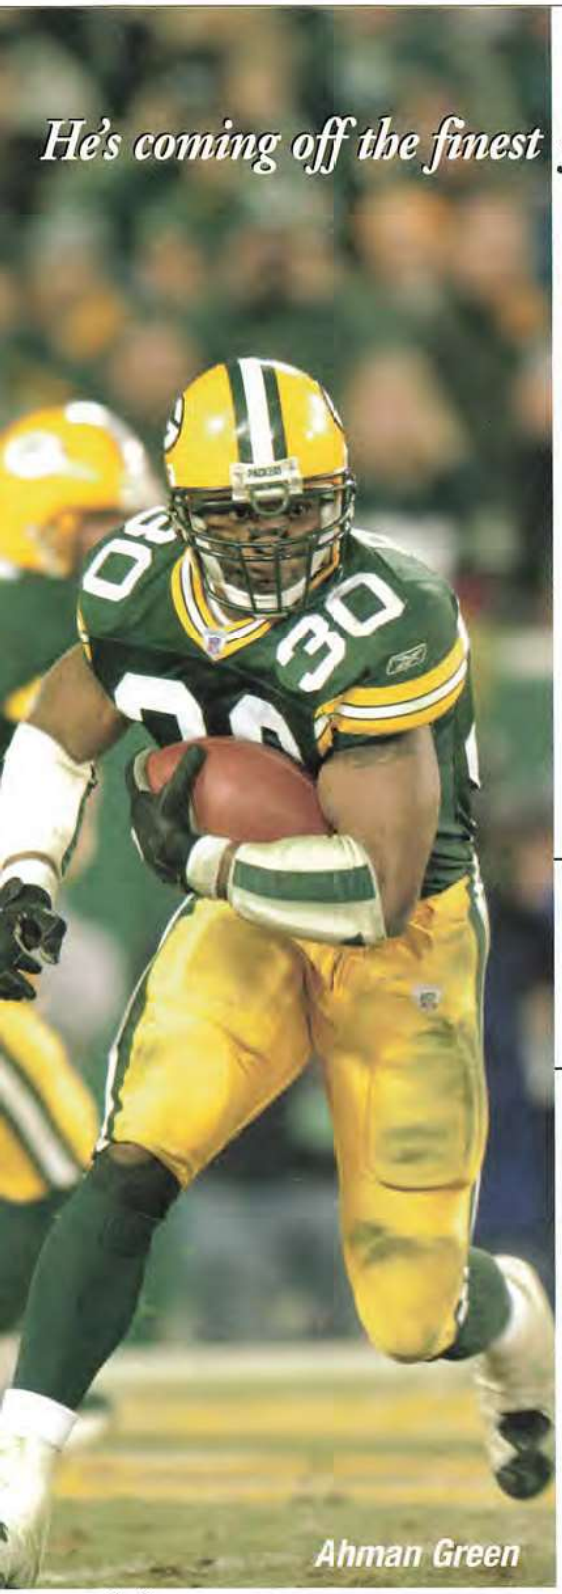
2000 Yards For Green? WHY NOT!

▶ By Rob Reischel, Packer Plus/Milwaukee Journal Sentinel



Ahman Green

He's coming off the finest year ever by a Green Bay Packer running back.

A season in which his 1,883 rushing yards shattered the old franchise mark. A year in which his rushing total tied for the seventh-best total in NFL history. A campaign in which he left defenders grasping and heads turning.

So just what could Ahman Green possibly do to top it? Dare we bring up the magical number 2,000?

Green says bring it on. "I think with what we did last year, that has to be a goal," said the 6-foot, 217-pound Green. "With everybody back and if everybody stays healthy and we're all on the same page, why not?"

Why not indeed?

Green, who turned 27 in February, is in the absolute prime of his football life. He has an extremely rare blend of speed and power and can run past defenders or over them.

Green's running behind arguably the best offensive line in football. He's in tremendous shape physically and is coming off a year where he stayed completely healthy. And set to begin his seventh season, there's little Green hasn't seen from opposing defenses.

So the way Green and the Packers look at it, why not talk about a 2,000-yard season. "He can definitely do it," said left guard Mike Wahle. "He has the talent to do it. It's a matter of getting the plays called and the getting in the right situations. We're going to get him yards. I'm not worried about that."

> "He's very smart and he's very coachable. …he's a guy that plays with reckless abandon."
> – Larry Beightol

"He's a guy who could definitely do it," added right guard Marco Rivera. "I believe he's one of the great backs in the league right now. If that's in the cards, it's up to us, the offensive linemen to block better. And I think we will. We're all healthy and we're ready to rock and roll."

Few in the 84-year history of the NFL rocked and rolled quite like Green did in 2003. In fact, Green's 1,883 rushing yards have only been surpassed by Eric Dickerson of the Los Angeles Rams (2,105 yards in 1984), Baltimore's Jamal Lewis (2,066 in 2003), Detroit's Barry Sanders (2,053 in 1997), Denver's Terrell Davis (2,008 in 1998), Buffalo's O.J. Simpson (2,003 in 1973) and Houston's Earl Campbell (1,934 in 1980).

Green's obliterated Jim Taylor's previous franchise rushing record of 1,474 yards, a mark that had stood 41 years. Green rushed for more than 100 yards on 10 occasions, which broke the old record of seven that both he and Taylor shared.

Green ran for 192 yards in a loss to Philadelphia on Nov. 10 to break Dorsey Levens' old mark of 190 yards. And if that wasn't good enough, Green erupted for 218 yards in the season finale versus Denver. That performance was highlighted by a 98-yard run on Green's final carry of the regular season, one that set another Packer record and was the second-longest carry from scrimmage in NFL history.

"Ahman Green is a just very special football player," Packers offensive line coach Larry Beightol said. "Not only does he have talent and great physical abilities, he's very smart and he's very coachable. And he's a guy that plays with reckless abandon."

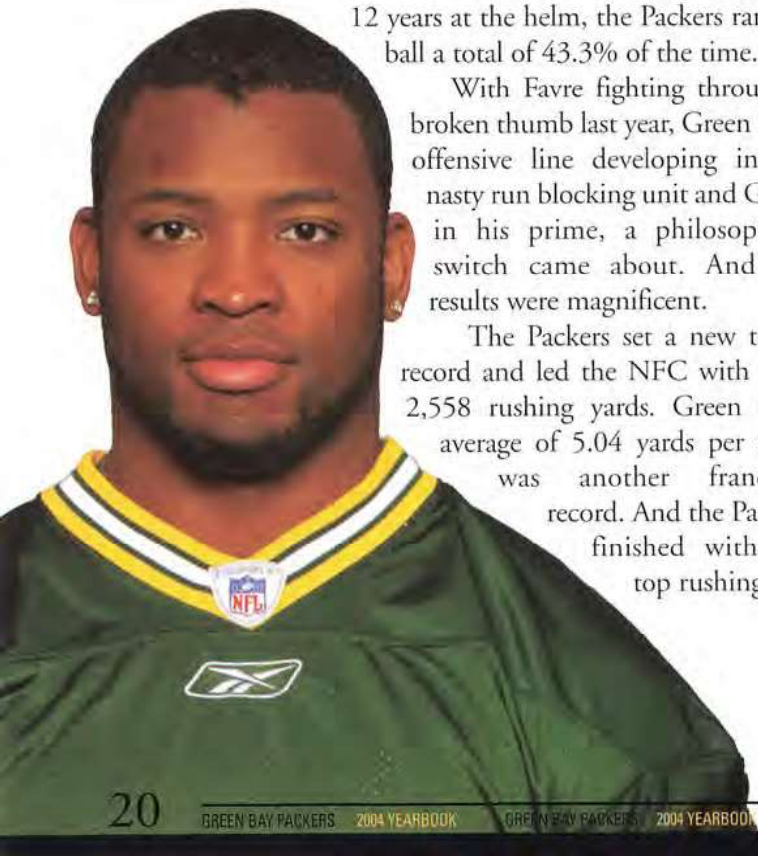
That was evident throughout his record-breaking year. Green's 355 carries were another franchise best, and his average of 5.30 yards per carry were the most by a Packers' leading rusher since Taylor averaged 5.42 in 1962. Green's 15 rushing touchdowns were second-most in team history and his 20 total touchdowns set a new Green Bay record.

In addition, Green's 50 receptions were second on the team behind Donald Driver's 52. He led the NFC and set a new team record in total yards with 2,250. And he was justly rewarded with his third trip to the Pro Bowl in his four years with Green Bay.

"A year like that is something else," Packers offensive coordinator Tom Rossley said. "You just won't see many like it. He's a special back and he proved it last year."

Perhaps the most amazing thing Green accomplished was helping turn Green Bay from predominantly a passing team to a run-first outfit. The Packers, who have lived and died on the brilliant right arm of Brett Favre since 1992, experienced a slight passing of the torch.

Green Bay ran the ball on 51.7% of its plays, its largest percentage of running plays since the 1979 outfit ran on 52.1% of the carries. In the Favre-era, the most a Green Bay team had ever run was in 1997 (46.7%). In Favre's previous 12 years at the helm, the Packers ran the ball a total of 43.3% of the time.



With Favre fighting through a broken thumb last year, Green Bay's offensive line developing into a nasty run blocking unit and Green in his prime, a philosophical switch came about. And the results were magnificent.

The Packers set a new team-record and led the NFC with their 2,558 rushing yards. Green Bay's average of 5.04 yards per carry was another franchise record. And the Packers finished with the top rushing offense in the NFC and the third-best in all of football.

"This offense has such great continuity right now," said Green, who was married this past off-season on Valentine's Day in Las Vegas. "Everybody knows each other real well and that's a big part of it. Everybody knows each other and is comfortable with each other and has played great."

Few have been better than Green, who continues his stampede on the Packer record books while having his name discussed among the most one-sided trades in NFL history. It was April 15, 2000, when then-general manager Ron Wolf acquired Green from Seattle for injured cornerback Fred Vinson.

In a 2003 interview, Wolf said that move — along with his dealing a first-round draft choice to Atlanta for Favre in 1992 — were both among the top 10 trades in NFL history. And who would argue?

While Favre has re-wrote both Green Bay and NFL record books and is a certain first ballot Hall of Famer, Green is following suit.

Although he's played in Green Bay just four years, he's run for an NFL-best 5,685 yards in that time. He also leads the league in yards from scrimmage (7,598) since 2000.

Green has vaulted into second place on the Packers' career rushing list, behind only Taylor's mark of 8,207 yards. Green's four 1,000-yard rushing seasons trail just Taylor's five. And his 24 100-yard rushing yard games are only two back of Taylor's career record.

And perhaps what's more exciting than anything to the Packer coaches is Green's just 27.

"He's still young," Rossley said of Green. "And I think as long as we can keep him healthy and our offensive line stays healthy, our goal is to keep him having years like last year."

Or maybe even better?

"He can get 2,000," said Kevin Barry, who played regularly as a sixth offensive lineman last year. "There aren't many, maybe not any backs in the league better than Ahman. As long as we open the holes like we did last year, he'll have a chance for 2,000."

And a chance to add to his growing legacy.

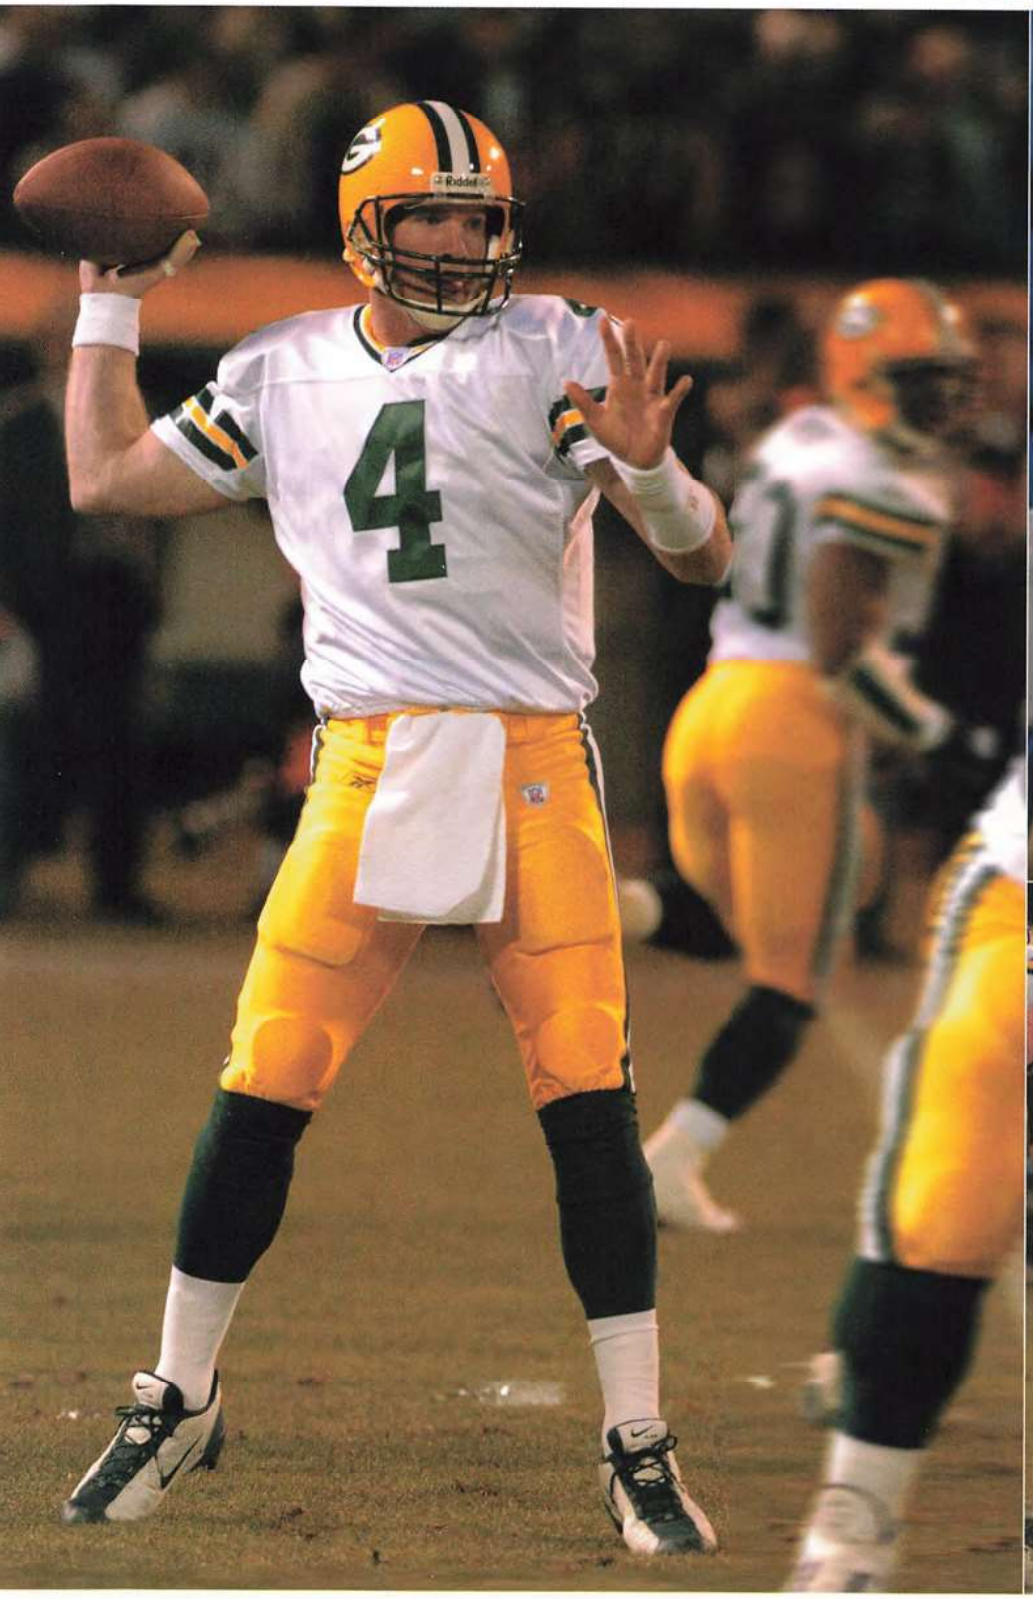
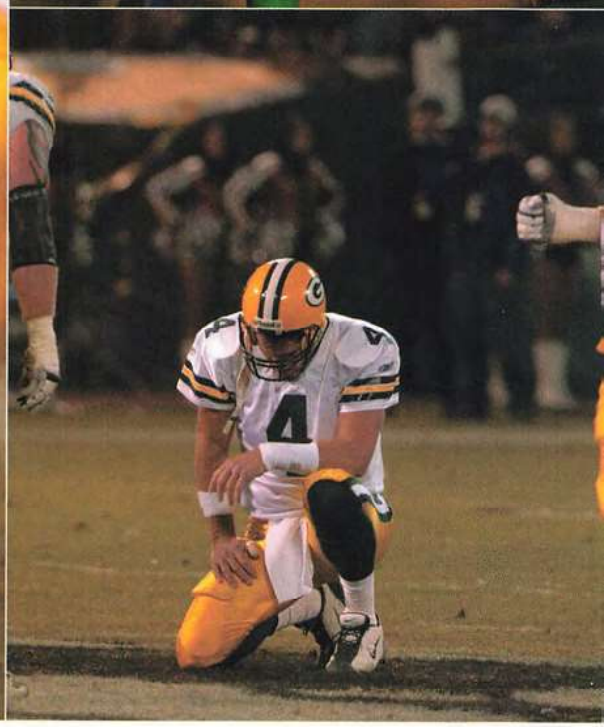
To Play, or





Not To Play...

FAVRE'S CHOICE WAS CLEAR

By Chris Havel, Green Bay Press-Gazette

Brett Favre figured he would be over it by now. It was late December, and he assumed he'd have grown accustomed to the privacy of his own hotel room. He thought he might like not having to arm-wrestle Frank Winters for the TV remote control. Not having to beat him to the Thermo-Stat. Not having to talk. He thought it, but he knew better.

Favre appraised the upscale Berkeley, Calif., hotel room, decided his old roomy would enjoy burrowing into such a lavish joint, and picked up the telephone. He missed Winters' company, and he didn't relish being alone on the eve of a game, so he dialed Doug Pederson's room and invited him to stop by and check out his deer hunting photos.

It was late Sunday afternoon, scarcely 24 hours before the Packers-Raiders game on Monday Night Football, when Pederson and Favre sat down to debate their hunting prowess and their handiwork, one 3x5 glossy at a time. Perhaps 15 minutes passed when Pederson's cell phone rang and interrupted the wildlife show-and-tell.

It was Deanna Favre.

She figured Brett had his cell phone turned off, like usual, so she called Pederson in the hope of locating her husband. It was an emergency, she explained, and she needed to talk with Brett right away. Pederson listened to the somber news, sat in stunned silence and handed the phone to Favre.

"Brett, it's your Dad," Deanna whispered. "I'm so sorry."

Irvin Favre, 58, had died of a heart attack while driving his car near the family's hometown of Kiln, Miss., earlier that day. Favre's older brother, Scott, and his sister, Brandi, were among the first on the scene. There was nothing anybody could do.

"I knew it was Dad even before Doug handed me the phone," Favre said. "When Deanna told me that he had died, I didn't know what to do or what to say or how to feel. I was probably in shock, looking back on it, and I don't remember saying much of anything at first. I remember promising Deanna I would call her back, and I remember hanging up. Then I lost it."

The tragic and unexpected news of his father's death blindsided the Packers' quarterback like nothing else could. He had feared for his father's health in recent months, and even nagged him to see a doctor, but his pleas were ignored.

Now his father was gone. The invincible, indestructible drill sergeant everyone called "Big Irv" was indeed mortal, heretofore an inconceivable notion, and Mike Sherman was talking to him through the fog. The Packers' coach and general manager told his quarterback he could do whatever he wished. If he wanted to play against the Raiders, he would start. If he chose to fly home to Kiln, everyone would understand.

Favre sent for Deanna. He needed to be with his wife. He also needed to make what appeared to be one of the most difficult decisions of his 13-year NFL career: To play or not to play?

To him the choice was clear.

"Everyone who knew Dad knew he would want me to play," Favre said. "There wasn't much I could do for anyone back home, and as hard as it was going to be to play, I wanted to be there for myself, my teammates and my coaches. We needed to win the game, and I knew a lot of people who had worked very hard were counting on me."

Their trust was well placed.

Favre endured what he described as "a surreal" game day, and he prepared as best he could, but he admitted he didn't have an inkling about what to expect at game time.

"I try to make sure I never underestimate a situation," he said. "But this was magnified. I knew everyone would be watching to see what happened and for the first time it was almost too big for me to handle. That scared me."

Favre's anxiety shadowed him from the locker room to the pre-game warm-ups, where the quarterback's breathing was labored and his passes were errant.

"I didn't want to let on how nervous I was feeling because I wanted the guys to have confidence in me," he said. "When we came out for our first drive I stepped into the huddle and said, 'Guys, we need this one.' I knew they were ready. I hoped I was."

Favre responded in record-setting fashion.

He completed his first pass to David Martin for a 2-yard loss. No one could have guessed that humble, shaky beginning would lead to one of Favre's greatest games.

"As well as (Favre) did, you couldn't draw up a better script than the one today," Sherman said. "I can't tell you how proud I am of Brett, and how proud I am of the way his teammates supported him during a very difficult time."

After the inauspicious completion to Martin, Favre went on to complete 22 of 30 passes to 12 different receivers for 399 yards. He fired four first-half touchdown passes and threw for 311 yards, his career best for a half.

"By him playing, we knew Brett had our backs," receiver Javon Walker said. "So we wanted to have his back, too."

Favre's first touchdown pass was a 21-yarder to fellow Mississippian Wesley Walls in the back corner of the end zone. Favre placed it where only Walls could make the catch, and the veteran tight end delivered with a sensational diving effort.

Favre's second touchdown pass was a 23-yarder to Walker. It gave the Packers a 14-0 first-quarter lead, and it foreshadowed what was to come.

Before the first half was finished, Favre added a 43-yard touchdown strike to Walker and a 6-yard TD pass to Martin, thus bringing the first half full circle.

"We were all feeding off his emotion," guard Marco Rivera said.

Added receiver Antonio Freeman, "You can't put a price on what Brett did. It's immeasurable."

By the time Favre and the Packers were finished, the offense had racked up 548 total yards – the third-highest total in franchise history – and the Packers had soared to a 41-7 blowout victory over the Raiders. The same Raiders Nation fans that greeted Favre with respectful applause during the pre-game introductions now cheered his name. Even Oakland's most hardened fans opened their hearts in response to Favre's courage.

"This is the proudest I think I've ever been of Brett," Packers president Bob Harlan said. "And that covers a lot of very special moments."

Favre's indomitable spirit – perhaps never more evident than his performance in a Monday Night Game at Oakland – enabled the Packers to go on to capture the NFC North championship and advance to the NFC divisional playoff round.

The three-time Most Valuable Player is convinced the Packers can build on the 2003 season, and that a trip to the NFC Championship Game is a reasonable goal. More than that, it's an attainable goal.

"I see good things for us this year," Favre said. "Nothing's guaranteed by I like our chances. I really do. I think we came of age last year, and we can only get better."

That growing up process manifested itself during an especially painful and emotional December evening in Berkeley when Favre was forced to cope with his father's death.

He felt a responsibility to address his teammates the night before the game, to let them know exactly where he stood given the unexpected circumstances, to reassure them.

He told them he was going to play, and that if they ever doubted whether he was with them, they needn't doubt it any longer. He choked back the tears long enough to thank them for their support, and for being so good to his father through the years.

There wasn't much else to say, and there wasn't a dry eye at the meeting, so he returned to his room and quietly grieved with those closest to him. When he was emotionally spent, and after some time had passed, he politely asked them to leave.

For the first time in his career, on the eve of a game, he preferred to be alone.

Bonita Favre

DEVOTED MOM

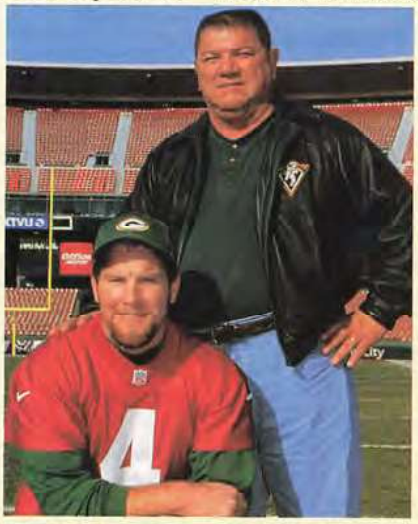
▶ By Chris Havel, Green Bay Press-Gazette

Bonita Favre sat on wicker chair on the front porch of the Favre family home that overlooks Rotten Bayou, and she pondered the question.

"Well," she said finally, sounding a little exasperated, "How would you describe yourself? That's a tough one."

The mother of Packers quarterback Brett Favre isn't prone to self-platitudes. Better to leave it to her NFL-playing son describe his mom.

"I've never asked her if she knows what a down-and-out is, but she doesn't miss a thing when it comes to football or life," he said. "Mom's the kind of lady who speaks her mind, and if you don't like it, well, that's too bad. She's also real protective of the whole family, and if you don't believe it, just say something bad about the Favres or the Frenches (her maiden name) around her. Then get ready to duck."



The late Irvin Favre poses with his son, Brett.

"Now, Mom is tough, but she also has a streak of compassion that runs deep. I liked to kid my parents every now and again, but Mom's a special person. So was Dad. The way they raised us. The love they gave us. The time we spent as a family. It was so incredible, and it still is. Ever since I can remember, Mom would be up at six in the morning getting breakfast cooked. It was never anything easy, either. I got spoiled."

Bonita smiled when told of Brett's comment.

"We all were spoiled, in a sense," she said. "It's been a great life. Now, that doesn't mean we haven't had some trying times the same as any family. But I was always taught that you have to thank God for the good and the bad because there are reasons, even when it's not good things. It is hard at times though."

This off-season has been more difficult than most.

Irvin Favre, the family patriarch, died of a massive heart attack on Sunday, Dec. 21, the day before the Packers played the Raiders on Monday Night Football in Oakland. The Packers won 41-7 thanks to four first-half touchdowns by Favre and a superb team effort. For the Favres the rest of an almost surreal week proved far more difficult.

Brett said there isn't a day that goes by he doesn't think about his Dad. He also said he never thought about how special and strong a person his mother was until the family had to deal with his Dad's death.

"Mom's an amazing woman," he said. "She really is."

Bonita, 59, taught special education for 30 years. She planned to spend her retirement with Irvin watching their children – Scott, Brett, Jeff and Brandi – grow up and raise families of their own.

Now she'll have to do it without her high school sweetheart.

"We were always early risers," she said. "Irvin and I would get up 5:30, 6 o'clock every morning, and we'd sit and have a cup of coffee and some breakfast. We would talk about what was going on that day, or with the kids, or whatever. It was our quiet time together. I miss that. I still get up early each day but of course it isn't the same."

Bonita's devotion to family remains unchanged. She still attends as many of the grandchildren's special events as is possible. It was the same when her kids were small.

"One day I asked Mom why it was that her and Dad made such an effort to be at every game," Brett said. "Mom just looked at me and said, "My dad missed my high school graduation. I didn't want any of you kids to feel that hurt."

Bonita was adopted at birth. She has since met her birth mother, but is as close to her adoptive mother as any mother-daughter could be.

"Family is your own children, of course, and there's nothing like your immediate family," she said. "But it can be extended family also. Blood sometimes doesn't mean anything. It's more than that. It's love and understanding and gratitude and togetherness."

She beams with pride at the thought of one of her own sons being Green Bay's favorite son.

"Of course I'm proud," she said. "You look at him on TV or in the newspaper and you say, 'Gosh, that's my son.' But when he's here and they're all here he's just Brett. People always say, 'What's it like to have a celebrity son?' To us he's no celebrity. When he's here he's just Brett."

Bonita is grateful that he has spent all but one of his 14 NFL seasons in Green Bay, where he has had a Hall of Fame career.

"It's just the greatest thing that he played in a city like Green Bay where it's similar to down south where the people are friendly," she said. "It's not one of these large metropolitan cities. He can feel comfortable there. He can be himself. The people are just so great. They welcomed him. The relationship has been overwhelming.

"I can't say what would've happened if he'd been in New York or Dallas – and it doesn't hurt that he's played pretty well – but it's been special to play in Green Bay. Just to see the number of people we get that come down here to see where he lived or where he went to school, to be that interested, it's something else."

AGGRESSIVE Bob Slowik TAKES OVER THE DEFENSE

▸ By Rob Demovsky, Green Bay Press-Gazette

Anyone who thinks Coach Mike Sherman's decision to promote Bob Slowik to defensive coordinator was purely a cosmetic change hasn't heard Slowik talk about his plans for the Packers' defense.

Yes, Slowik's defensive scheme won't change drastically from what the Packers ran the previous four seasons under Ed Donatell. But there's more to defense in the NFL than the system that is played.

- There's the way the coordinator teaches it.
- There's the way the coordinator motivates players.
- There's the way the coordinator calls plays on game day.

All of that – and more – will likely change under Slowik's watch.

"If there's even a doubt about what we're going to do," Slowik said, "we'll be aggressive."

Aggressive is often a buzzword with defensive coordinators who promise multiple blitz packages, but Slowik appears intent on delivering. He has a specific plan to expand on the usual collection of third-down blitzes, which has become the norm in the NFL. Instead, Slowik has promised an unpredictable array of blitzes that will be just as likely to come on first and second down.

"Last year, we got into situations where a team was driving on us, and we didn't attack," safety Darren Sharper said. "This year, I don't think we're going to sit back. We're going to force the issue a little more."

Talking about being more aggressive and actually doing it can be two different things. No one understands that better than Slowik.

"It's not what you say, it's what you do that determines your identity," he said. "On game day, we plan on carrying through with that promise."

Sherman could have gone outside the organization for his new defensive coordinator after he decided to make a change. Qualified candidates were aplenty. There was former Arizona Cardinals coach Dave McGinnis and former Chicago Bears defensive coordinator Greg Blache (once a former Packers assistant) to name a couple. But Sherman chose to remain in house, a sign he felt the defense needed some – but not sweeping – changes.

> "It's not what you say, it's what you do that determines your identity."
> – Slowik

It was also a sign of his respect for Slowik, a veteran of 27 years in the coaching business, including a dozen in the NFL. Sherman thought highly enough of Slowik that in 2002 he gave Slowik the title of assistant head coach – a job he still owns today.

"I just don't want to blow up our defense and start over," Sherman said. "There are some things we do well. The players understand what we want to get done. It's just that I felt the leadership needed to go in a different direction. Ed (Donatell) did a fine job for us, and we've done some very good things defensively. I just want to take things to another level."

Though Slowik has not coordinated his own defense since the 1999 season, when he was with the expansion Cleveland Browns during their first season back in the NFL, he spent six years in charge of the Bears' defense (from 1993 to 1998). His seven years of defensive coordinator experience make him one of the NFL's veteran most coordinators. Only six current NFL defensive coordinators have more tenure in that role.

In Chicago, with arguably far less talent than he will have with the Packers, Slowik's defenses were ranked fourth, 13th, 19th, 12th, 14th and 14th in the NFL. He said he has not only learned from his previous experiences but has new things to implement as well.

"I still wasn't able to do quite as much as I aspired to do," Slowik said of his time in Chicago. "You have to fit everything as a coordinator within the parameters of what the head coach sets, so sometimes when you're working with a defensive head coach, you don't have quite as much leeway.

"As a coordinator, as a football coach, the longer you're in the NFL you understand that the game is constantly evolving. And I think that the seven years I was a coordinator that I was able to evolve and change with the game and find some new little wrinkles that can help a team get over the hump.

"It's like coach Sherman said – We're not that far away. There's a lot of good things that we did on defense. There really are. Interceptions and takeaways have always been high, stopping the run made a dramatic jump. Our pass defense and keeping down explosive passes is something that we've always been pretty good at. So those things we've got to continue to do pretty well."

If there's a specific part of the Packers' play Slowik wants to fix, it's late-game defensive stops. In his mind, the Packers weren't good enough in that area last season as evidenced by game-winning or game-tying drives put together by Kansas City and Philadelphia – both in the regular season and the infamous fourth-and-26 play in the playoffs.

"The biggest thing this last year, which we were close to getting to where we want to go, but there's our fourth-down defense, being able to hold a lead in the fourth quarter, closing out the game and putting the nail in the coffin in the two-minute drill," Slowik said. "We've got to be able to generate more sacks. We've done good in sacks in the past but we didn't generate quite as many of the sacks as we needed, particularly with the game on the line. Those are the real primary areas that we need to improve in dramatically."

IF YOU Renovate It THEY WILL COME

▶ By Tom Perry, Green Bay Press-Gazette

Baseball has a fictional "Field of Dreams," with its insistent voice, "If you build it, they will come." Football has a reality, Lambeau Field, which is now demonstrating, "If you renovate it, they will come, in droves, year-round." For decades, fans have traveled from all over the country and the world to visit the home of the Green Bay Packers.

Even when the stadium was little more than a functional football facility, it attracted admirers, especially on game days. But now, with the $295 million renovation of Lambeau Field completed, 1265 Lombardi Ave. has become the National Football League's ultimate address for all seasons. Of course, that was part of the plan, as conceived by Packers President and Chief Executive Officer Bob Harlan and the Packers' board of directors. "We were always getting requests from people who'd want to have weddings or business seminars here," Harlan said. "I felt bad we had no place for them. Now we do."

Indeed, the Packers do have a place for those people and even more inside the Lambeau Field Atrium, housing the Green Bay Packers Hall of Fame, Curly's Pub and the new Hall of Fame Grill and offering stadium tours so visitors can see the sights. A bold vision and careful planning led to these Lambeau Field "add-ons." Early in the game though it is, the instant, almost overwhelming success being enjoyed by the facility is adding another chapter to the legend and lore of the Green Bay Packers. Harlan has said, "Overall, the stadium is doing exactly what we envisioned."

As built, the Atrium may seem like a natural, yet the concept of a sports venue as a year-round attraction is uncharted territory in pro football. Even Harlan concedes that at first he was "leery" of making the Lambeau Field Atrium part of the renovation project because it had not been tried before by a sports team.

Now, Green Bay Mayor Jim Schmitt thinks the Atrium is largely responsible for Lambeau Field "exceeding all expectations." Since the completion of the project, Lambeau Field "is being utilized by anyone and everyone for all sorts of purposes," the mayor said. In February, Schmitt presided over a gala that drew more than 900 people to celebrate the 150th anniversary of Green Bay's incorporation as a city. "As mayor of Green Bay, I give a lot of welcomes to groups," Schmitt said. "The e-mails I get back from people almost all say that visiting the new Lambeau Field was a highlight of their stay."

Dennis Duckett, on-premises sales manager for Triangle Distributing, the Green Bay-area wholesaler for Miller Brewing Co., makes frequent stops to service Lambeau Field. "From what I've seen, I think it's doing better than a lot of people expected," Duckett said. "Everybody knew Lambeau Field would be busy during the season, but come February and March, it was hard to say what was going to happen."

As it turned out, in the weeks and months immediately following the Packers' playoff run, the Green Bay Packers Hall of Fame and the daily stadium tours attracted robust crowds. Through the first seven months of operation, more than 87,000 people visited the hall of fame, and more than 38,000 took stadium tours, many of which sell out.

Kari Sliva, president of the Packer Country Regional Tourism Office, said the area is already seeing the benefits of adding a year-round Lambeau Field to the mix of local attractions. "It's definitely had a positive impact on tourism, no question," Sliva said of the Lambeau Field Atrium. "We've seen people coming to Green Bay year-round now as opposed to just during football season. There's so much more to do and see."

Green Bay-area room-tax figures for the first three months of 2004 reflect a surge in the number of visitors. Sliva said that room-tax receipts for Fireworks light up the Green Bay sky as Packers fans celebrate the renovation of Lambeau Field during stadium "rededication" festivities the night of September 6, 2003.

January, February and March of this year were 18 percent higher than in the same period in 2003."It's really been incredible," she said. "We're very happy with the amount of traffic we're seeing at Lambeau and the amount of inquiries we're getting from all over the country."

In May, as demand for stadium tours increased and with training camp approaching, the Packers began working on strategies to increase the number of tours from one per hour to four an hour. Dave Devenport, one of about 20 tour guides, led tours at Lambeau Field before the renovation project began.The difference between the pre-renovation tours and the ones he now leads is dramatic. "It's all under one roof now and people like that," he said of the tours. "Of course, we always joke with the people that it's all under one roof, except for one thing, the field." Most of the people he's led on the new tours come away feeling more impressed with the facility and the tour than they anticipated, Davenport said. Walking through the tunnel used by players as they run onto the field "is a big draw," he said. "I think the biggest thing is that they get to go sit in a private box and then they get to go down on the field," he said. "The fact that they can go through that tunnel excites people."

In early May, Peter Mason of New York City drove up to Lambeau Field while in Milwaukee on a business trip and decided to take a stadium tour. "You hear so much about this place over the years, and I had a day where nothing was scheduled, so I figured why not come check it out," said Mason, who described himself as a "closet Packers fan" since the days of Vince Lombardi. "This actually turned out to be more than I thought it would be," he said of Lambeau Field. "I really like what the Packers did by not really changing the inside of the stadium. You can feel the history here."

Steve Klegon, director of Atrium business development, speaks of the over-achieving nature of the renovations in terms of "customer experience." "When people come in here, they're wowed on how well everything was done and how many different things there are for them to do," he said. "They're impressed by how long they can spend time here and just continually soak up football."

Everything that's available at the newly renovated Lambeau Field may seem like a dream come true for Packers fans.But in reality, as pro football's ultimate address for all seasons, 1265 Lombardi Ave. is proof positive that if you renovate it, they will come, in droves, year-round.

Bob Harlan
ENTERS PACKERS 'HALL'

▶ By Bud Lea, Packer Plus Columnist

When Bob Harlan was attending Marquette University in the 1950s, his life's dream was to return to his hometown in Iowa and work for the Des Moines Register. If he could be anything he wanted to be, it would be a sportswriter on the paper he had grown up with and still loved.

Bob never got that chance. After graduating from Marquette, he spent six months in the service because of an ROTC commitment and then got a job with United Press-International in Milwaukee.

Four months later, his alma mater called and offered him the job as sports information director and he eventually worked with legendary basketball coach Al McGuire during the 1964-65 season.

So, why would a guy who once interviewed Vince Lombardi at County Stadium for UPI after the Green Bay Packers had lost a game to the Baltimore Colts want to dabble in public relations? The Milwaukee Sentinel thought so much of Harlan's first and-only interview with Lombardi that it played the story on page one.

"Because once I got into the public relations field, I kind of decided I didn't want to go back into newspaper writing," Harlan said. Fair enough.

That decision, it would turn out years later, would lead to Bob Harlan's prominence in Packer history. Instead of possibly writing about them, he became the most influential president in franchise history.

Because his judgments generally are so sound, the Packers have become the most consistent winners over the last decade in the NFL. His approach to the job as president/CEO, his innovations and his decisive leadership identify Harlan as one of the top front office executives in the league.

On Saturday, July 17 Harlan was inducted into the Packer Hall of Fame. NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue thought the occasion is so important that he personally attended the ceremony in the Lambeau Field atrium.

If Bob Harlan seems to have a firm handle on life, it's probably due to his background. Spend time working at Marquette, the St. Louis Cardinals and Packers and you take in more knowledge that you dispense. You learn how to organize and communicate.

Breaking into sports public relations in the 50's was not easily obtained without connections. Broadcaster Merle Harmon, who had called Marquette basketball games, mentioned Harlan's name when the St. Louis Cardinals were moving into a new stadium and adding people to their front office staff.

Baseball is a business you begin at the bottom. Harlan started out as director of community relations and the speakers bureau. Three years later, he was named the Cardinals' director of public relations as St. Louis opened its new stadium, hosted the All-Star game and won the '67 World Series.

When former Missouri coach Dan Devine was named head coach and general manager of the Packers in 1971, he was looking for someone to help ease the workload and also help him do pro contracts. He offered Harlan the job and he accepted.

"My first job with the Packers was assistant to the general manager. It was basically to do his paper work, help with tickets and public relations – and start doing contracts," Harlan said. "I hadn't done a contract in my life, but he wanted me to start doing that – both players and assistant coaches."

So, he practically learned by himself. Before his wife, Madeline, joined him in Green Bay where they were building a new home, he would stay in the office late at night and go through old contracts. Harlan ended up doing contracts for 15 years, which cost him many summer vacations with his family but added to his growing resume.

"...you have to have someone who is good in dealing with the media, very good at marketing and a person who is reading shareholders and fans. Those are Bob's strengths." – Peter Platten

Back in 1989, the world was a different place.

George H. Bush and Dan Quayle took office. Chinese students rallying for democracy in Tiananmen Square were attacked by the national army. The Berlin Wall was opened and hundreds of thousands of East Germans streamed into West Germany. And a week's worth of civil disturbances in Miami cast a cloud over Super Bowl XXIII.

Meanwhile, at 1265 Lombardi Ave., the Packers were going to elect a new president, something they had not done in seven years. Ten people had been screened for the job.

On June 6, 1989, Bob Harlan, 52, was chosen by the Packers' 45-member board of directors to succeed Robert Parins and become the ninth president in the team's long history.

"He turned out to be a unanimous choice," executive committee member Jim Temp recalled. "But before he was elected president, there was a faction on the board that wanted to conduct a nation-wide search. The Judge anointed him, and that was that. Everyone jumped on Bob's bandwagon."

Parins admitted that there were one or two people on the board that thought the Packers should go outside the board and the city for his replacement. The Judge said he had talked to outsiders about the job, including some who had been front office executives with other teams.

"I personally came to the conclusion that we needed someone here who had a clear understanding of what the Packers meant to this community and how important it was to have a sound franchise in Green Bay and to be competitive.

"The more I thought about it, Bob was a strong candidate. He stood out more than anyone else. He also made a strong impression on (former president) Dominic Olejniczak."

The election of Harlan marked the first time the Packers nominated someone with NFL experience to run the franchise, and it was the first time that someone outside Brown County had risen to the very top of the organization. Harlan had been with the team for 18 years. While Devine would be fired after the Packers finished 6-8 in 1974, Harlan stayed in the front office and kept rising through the ranks.

The presidency of the Packers had always gone to somebody on the executive committee, a group of elected people who oversee management. Everything was about to change.

Bob Harlan will go down in Packer history as the president who did more for the franchise that any other chief executive. Under his astute leadership, the Packers got the right people in the right places as the team returned to the Super Bowl, launched a successful fourth stock sale, authorized construction of the Don Hutson Center, and took the Packers' case directly to the fans and eventually lead to the Brown County referendum for the $295 million renovation of Lambeau Field.

"I'm not sure that without his vision that all of this would have fallen into place," executive committee member and team treasurer John Underwood said. "It had to be understood by a lot of people – politicians on the state level, county level and local level. It had to be understood by people who voted on the referendum.

"Somebody had to put this whole thing together, this whole Lambeau Field project. If we couldn't have done what we did, we would have been headed to financial oblivion. We just wouldn't have had the financial horsepower to be able to compete.

"Now, based on what we did, we ought to be able to look ahead and say we can survive and compete for another generation."

You don't have to love football to buy the New York Jets. You just have to love getting your name in the papers. But you have to love football to run the Green Bay Packers.

"The Packers are probably the highest-profile organization in the state of Wisconsin, executive committee member Peter Platten said. "When something like that exists, you have to have someone who is good in dealing with the media, very good at marketing, and a person who is reading shareholders and fans. Those are Bob's strengths."

"Another one that I didn't think was obvious at the beginning is his knack of hiring excellent people. He went out and got Ron Wolf to come here. There's a good number of managers that we've acquired in the last five years. Bob has had a hand in choosing all of those people.

"Look at the Packers Pro Shop. It's an on-line thing, has a catalog. It's a major source of revenue. It will come close to $15 million."

Ron Wolf always will be grateful to Harlan for giving him the chance to run the Packers his way – with no interference. The absence of an extrovert owner made Wolf's job easier. No extra opinion was brought to the draft table. Football people were making the football decisions.

"He said he was going to put me in charge of the football operations, and he lived up to that," Wolf said. "Anything we needed we got."

There was a great working atmosphere there. Everybody was for the team. They were proud to be members of that.

"I had to go before the executive committee (on building the Don Hutson Center), which Bob chaired. He could have squashed that, but he didn't. That was something we needed. It helped us immeasurably with the success we had up there."

"Understand that before we did anything I had to go to Bob and get permission. Like trading a No. 1 draft choice to Atlanta for Brett Favre. Once we got success, we pretty much got whatever we wanted. I'm sure there were some unreasonable things I wanted, but I can't think of one instance where he said 'no.'"

Bob Harlan is the rarest of all major sports executives. He answers his own phone. Why? "I like to avoid all the confusion of going through secretaries if people are trying to reach me," he said. "And, secondly, I feel I owe the fans that. I think since these people own this team, if they want to reach me, they should be able to do so."

Nine years ago, Harlan made a major change. After 32 years of splitting their home schedule with Green Bay and Milwaukee, Harlan moved all the games to Lambeau Field where the team could make an extra $2.5 million per year because of luxury boxes.

Would Harlan desert the Milwaukee fans, who had supported the team for 62 years? Absolutely not. A compromise was reached. The Green Bay schedule was split into two packages, with Green Bay people getting one set and Milwaukee the other. Ninety-six percent of Milwaukee ticket holders took the deal.

"There were times in our history we never would have survived without Milwaukee," Harlan said. "We owed something to these people. So we just took 'em with us." Tell that to Al Davis and Bill Bidwill and Art Modell, who don't care what they do or where they go.

Harlan runs on a full tank of talent, but his arrogance level is on empty. This is what keeps the Packers up there. They inducted just one person into the Packers Hall of Fame this summer. Who ever thought the kid from Des Moines who wanted to go back to Iowa and become a sportswriter would become the most respected and beloved president/CEO in Packer history?

We salute you, Bob Harlan.

Getting Defensive

PACKERS PUT EMPHASIS ON DEFENSE IN DRAFT

▶ By Todd Korth, Packer Report

Michael Hawthorne welcomes the competition. After the Green Bay Packers used their first two selections of the April NFL Draft on cornerbacks, Hawthorne sat in his locker after a post-draft minicamp practice and praised Mike Sherman's decision to beef up the team's secondary.

"The more the merrier," said Hawthorne, a veteran defensive back who signed a two-year contract with the Packers during the off-season. "There's more people to play special teams, there's more people to contribute on defense in case of injuries. Instead of being short-handed and wondering and have to go get somebody to come in ... it always helps. Depth helps. You never know who may emerge in the next five years."

The Packers selected Ahmad Carroll of Arkansas in the first round and Joey Thomas of Montana State in the third. With disgruntled cornerback Mike McKenzie threatening never to return to Green Bay, the Packers covered themselves at the cornerback position through the draft. McKenzie held out of Green Bay's off-season workout program and did not attend the team's two minicamps because he is unhappy with his current contract. McKenzie's antics along with the fact that cornerback Al Harris will become an unrestricted free agent at the end of this season forced the Packers to address their major present and future needs.

"Once we got into the draft we tried to address the needs of our team as they are today," said Sherman. "We can't speculate or assume things are going to happen if they're not going to happen."

Defensive lineman Donnell Washington of Clemson was the team's second choice in the third round. Punter B.J. Sander of Ohio State also was picked in the third to replace the departed Josh Bidwell.

"We got the corner in the first round and were able to get two second-round players on our board in the third round," vice president of football operations Mark Hatley said. "We thought we had a good day."

Hatley insisted the choices had nothing to do with McKenzie, who has demanded to be traded despite the fact that he has three years left on a five-year, $17.1 million contract he signed in December of 2001.

"It had to do with what the board said and what we want," Hatley said. "Any time you can get cover guys you have to address that. It just happened that both of them were corners."

Carroll is 5-foot-10 and 195 pounds and he only had four interceptions in 36 games for the Razorbacks, but the Packers are impressed by his speed, strength, leaping ability, and work ethic. He ran the 40-yard dash in 4.34 seconds in a pre-draft workout.

The Packers had Carroll rated as the No. 2 corner in the draft behind only Virginia Tech's DeAngelo Hall, who was selected eighth overall by the Atlanta Falcons. "This is a unique guy," said Sherman. "He's strong. He's compact. He has a 10-8 broad jump, 41-inch vertical."

"I think the biggest thing about corners is to have the ability to play the ball downfield. We feel he can do that. He leans on people and pushes them to the sideline like we like to do."

Sherman feels Carroll can be the No. 3 cornerback and nickel back immediately, and also make a major contribution on special teams.

"This is my guy," Sherman said. "He fights you. He will give some plays up to bigger guys but I don't think they're going to beat him deep."

Thomas, 6-1 and 195, has 4.44-second speed in the 40-yard dash compared to Carroll's 4.34 clocking. Playing in the Division I-AA ranks, he was good at getting in the face of wide receivers.

"The hardest thing was level of competition," Hatley said. "You didn't see him against a lot of quality receivers. Where he really separated himself was down at the Senior Bowl. We felt like he had a lot of special qualities."

Like Carroll, Washington, 6-5 1/2 and 323 pounds, entered the draft a year early. When he was still available early in the third round, the Packers traded up 14 spots with Jacksonville and took him with the 72nd pick.

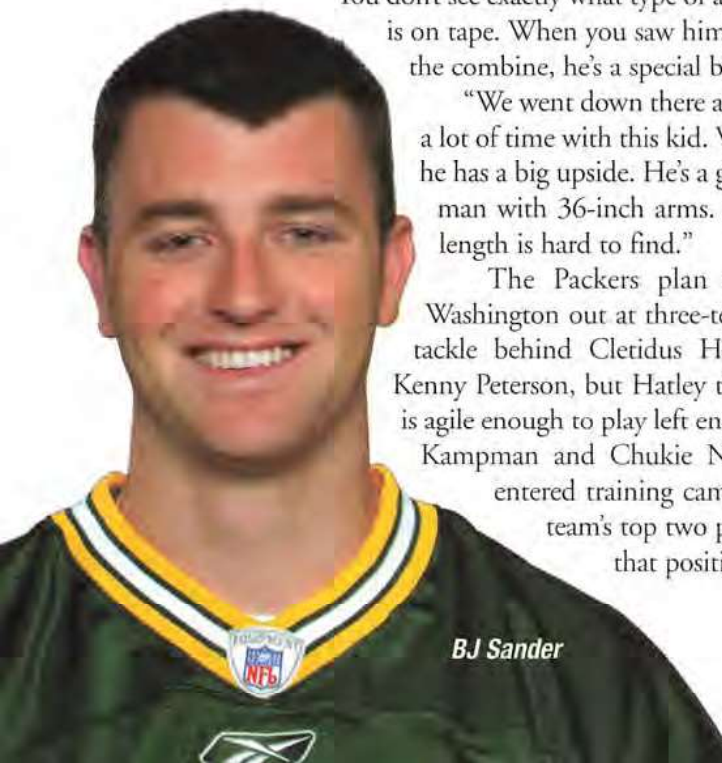
"We felt like he was the best big man left on the board," Hatley said. "He also was the highest-rated player left on the board for us. It was a pretty easy decision."

Washington is of similar size to James Lee (6-5, 325), the defensive tackle the Packers traded up to take in the fifth round in 2003. Hatley feels Washington has better potential than Lee.

"He's very talented," Hatley said. "Covers a lot of ground. You don't see exactly what type of athlete he is on tape. When you saw him work at the combine, he's a special big man.

"We went down there and spent a lot of time with this kid. We think he has a big upside. He's a giant of a man with 36-inch arms. His arm length is hard to find."

The Packers plan to start Washington out at three-technique tackle behind Cletidus Hunt and Kenny Peterson, but Hatley thinks he is agile enough to play left end. Aaron Kampman and Chukie Nwokorie entered training camp as the team's top two players at that position.



BJ Sander

The Packers then traded the fourth-round pick (102) they obtained from the Jaguars earlier in the day and a fifth-round pick (153) to Miami for the third-round pick (87) they used for Sander.

Sander, 6-3 1/2 and 219, is expected to win the job vacated when Bidwell was departed in unrestricted free agency in March. Travis Dorsch, who stumbled as a fourth-round pick in 2002 with Cincinnati, entered training camp as Sander's main competition.

Sander, a left-footed punter, ranked fourth in the nation with a 41.0-yard net average in 2003 and won the Ray Guy Award. He did not see any action in 2002 and only punted four times in 2001. He split punting duties in 2000.

"He doesn't need a whole lot of technique work," Bonamego said. "He's very fundamentally sound and has very good leg strength. He can fill a need for a number of years. Time will tell."

Sander is the highest drafted punter since the New York Giants took Brad Maynard in the third round in 1997. No punter had been taken in the first day in the last six drafts.

"He's got a good drop," Bonamego said. "He holds the ball low, which is particularly advantageous in a windy climate. He's very consistent with his drop.

"He's got a powerful swing. He did a very good job punting going in and directionally. He's pretty good all the way around."

Bidwell was a fourth-round pick in 1999. The last time the Packers drafted a punter as high as the third round was 1981 when Michigan State's Ray Stachowicz arrived in Round 3, but he struggled and only lasted two seasons in Green Bay.

The Packers gave up a seventh-round pick to move up nine places in the sixth round and took versatile defensive tackle Corey Williams of Arkansas State. The 6-3 1/2, 313-pound Williams started at tackle the last two seasons. He was a weak-side end in '01 and even played some linebacker early in '00. As a 250-pounder in high school, Williams played fullback, linebacker, defensive end and kicker. He also starred in basketball, baseball and was on the track team.

Packers director of college scouting John Dorsey says he has better lateral movement than Washington.

"Towards the end of the season he missed three games with a high ankle sprain so his production went down there," Dorsey said. "But if you went back and looked at his junior (season) film and his senior film, you see an athlete who's got great feet, great change of direction and he's got power."

A four-year starter at the University of Tennessee, Scott Wells is short (6-1, 300) and has short arms but very strong. Wells set the Volunteers' bench press record at 545 pounds. His consecutive starting streak of 49 games was the third-longest in college football history.

Sherman felt part of the reason Wells slipped to the seventh round was because of his height.

THE PACKERS' Unpredictable 2003 SEASON

▶ By Tom Oates, Wisconsin State Journal

Since lightning never strikes twice in the same place, the Green Bay Packers had every reason to believe the 2003 season would be a smooth trip after some too-close-for-comfort lightning bolts put a premature end to their preseason opener.

The Packers trailed Kansas City, 9-0, in the Hall of Fame Game at Canton, Ohio, when NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue pulled the plug on the national telecast with 5 minutes, 49 seconds left in the third quarter. Safety first, Tagliabue said, getting no argument from those who had witnessed nature's pyrotechnics.

"Hell yeah, it was a good decision," quarterback Brett Favre said afterward. "I don't want to get struck by lightning."

Favre had no way of knowing at the time, but the lightning strikes were just beginning for the Packers. Instead of getting the zaniness out of the way early, the storm that halted the Hall of Fame Game was a sign of things to come.

"It was," linebacker Marcus Wilkins said, "pretty crazy out there."

It was about to get crazier. Indeed, it seemed a higher power was sending a message during the preseason, that someone up there was trying to brace the Packers for the unique, drama-filled season that was about to unfold.

The team's third preseason game, at Cleveland, was nearly cancelled due to the largest electical blackout in our nation's history. Then the final preseason game — Tennessee at home — was delayed for 2 1/2 hours by rain and lightning.

Talk about fitting. Lightning bolts would strike the Packers weekly during the regular season and playoffs, building in intensity until a final four-game stretch that defied the laws of nature, physics and probability all at the same time.

From the start, the regular season was filled with hair-raising developments. The Packers lost their opener to the rival Minnesota Vikings on the same day that Lambeau Field, renovated to the tune of $295 million, was re-dedicated.

Fans hadn't even settled into their seats for the next game, an easy victory over Detroit, when lightning struck again. Ahman Green went 65 yards for a touchdown on his initial carry, the first hint of a record-setting season for the rapidly emerging halfback.

But the fun was just beginning. Over the next few weeks, the Packers wilted in the Arizona heat, spoiled the grand reopening of Soldier Field for the Chicago Bears, rudely welcomed former coaches Mike Holmgren and Ray Rhodes back to Lambeau with five straight touchdown drives against Seattle, fumbled away a 17-point lead in a loss to Kansas City and lost at St. Louis when Favre broke his thumb after hitting it on guard Mike Wahle's helmet.

Even the bye week couldn't slow the surprising chain of events. With a splint on his thumb, Favre started at Minnesota and directed a rare victory in the Metrodome with three touchdown passes. Green Bay's 261 yards rushing were the most since 1985.

Soggy conditions led to six fumbles and a last-minute loss to Philadelphia, followed by a victory over the defending Super Bowl champion Buccaneers at Tampa when the Packers drove 98 yards on 17 plays for a fourth-quarter touchdown. A routine victory over San Francisco — for those scoring at home, that's 10 of 11 in the Favre era — was followed by the most disheartening game of the season, a Thanksgiving Day loss at Detroit in which the Packers gave the ball away five times.

With a 6-6 record and trailing Minnesota by 1 1/2 games in the NFC Central Division, the Packers exited Ford Field with a clear understanding of their task. To have any chance at the playoffs, they had to win their final four games and hope for help.

The Packers did their job, routing Chicago, San Diego, Oakland and Denver by a combined score of 144-52. They scored 34 unanswered points to beat the Bears and against the Chargers watched Favre (consecutive games with a touchdown pass), Green (single-season rushing) and kicker Ryan Longwell (career scoring) surpass long-standing team records. But those events only set the stage for a drama-filled four weeks that had Packers fans holding their collective breath and the NFL's television partners counting their cash.

It began on a California golf course when Favre learned that his father Irvin had died of a heart attack in Kiln, Miss. Later that night, Favre uncharacteristically bared his soul to his teammates, telling them he would stay with them — his second family — and play the following night against Oakland.

The Monday Night Football cameras had barely begun to roll when Favre, his heart heavy and his thumb still in a splint, began to show the nation's mesmerized fans the combination of toughness and talent that has characterized his brilliant career. Seemingly everything Favre threw into the air came down in the arms of one of his receivers. By halftime of the Packers' 41-7 victory, he had thrown for 311 yards and four touchdowns.

"I've never seen anything like what I witnessed today," Wahle said. "I'm just speechless. You hate to have things like that happen, but I was damn proud to be part of a game where Brett played like that. That's legendary."

PACKERS MATCH POSTSEASON 'OT' RECORD

To be sure, the '03 postseason didn't unfold the way the Packers had envisioned it, but it did not keep them from matching playoff history in the bittersweet process.

The faithful will remember that the Green and Gold found themselves playing back-to-back overtime games in their brace of postseason contests, advancing with an electrifying, 33-27 victory over the Seattle Seahawks in their wild card playoff at Lambeau Field, then falling to the Eagles at Philadelphia in their divisional playoff a week later, 20-17.

Though denied the opportunity to reach Super Bowl XXXVIII, the Packers did become only the second team in National Football League annals to play back-to-back overtime games in the Postseason.

The Cleveland Browns were the first team to do so, defeating the New York Jets, 23-20, in their 1987 overtime divisional playoff, then bowing to Denver, also 23-20, in sudden death in their AFC conference showdown as John Elway directed the Broncos to victory with a 98-yard drive.

Some suggested that Favre's father must have been watching over him from above, guiding his passes. It didn't become apparent until the next game that Big Irv wasn't the only one lending a hand.

Led by Green's team-record 218 rushing yards, which included a 98-yard touchdown run, the Packers easily dispatched the short-handed Broncos. But the real drama was occurring not at Lambeau but many miles away in Tempe, Ariz.

Minnesota, which had only to get past Arizona to win the division and eliminate the Packers from the playoffs, took a 17-6 lead in the fourth quarter. As the Packers starters relaxed on the Lambeau sideline late in the fourth quarter, it looked like a 4-0 finish would be all they would have to celebrate.

However, when the fans started turning their backs to the field and watching the television sets in the luxury boxes, the Packers figured something was up. Roars went up when the Cardinals kicked a field goal and recovered an onside kick.

Finally, the crowd erupted when Josh McCown completed an improbable Arizona rally with a 28-yard, fourth-down touchdown pass to Nate Poole in the final seconds. The Packers, taking their cue from the fans, began a wild celebration behind their bench.

"That lets you know that someone's on our side," safety Darren Sharper said. "Someone from up there has definitely looked upon us and given us some breaks. This might be a storybook season that we have here."

The story wasn't about to end, either. In what might have been payback for the storm-shortened opener, the Packers were forced to play two overtime games in the playoffs, the second time that had happened in NFL history.

In a first-round playoff duel that was tied four times, the Packers stunned Seattle with a dramatic reversal of fortune in overtime. Cornerback Al Harris put a sudden end to the game by picking off Matt Hasselbeck's pass and returning it 52 yards for a touchdown and a 33-27 victory.

By the time Harris crossed the goal line, people were calling the Packers a team of destiny, a sentiment the Packers didn't necessarily agree with.

"That was a storybook ending," Wahle said, "but if you look at it, the defensive line got great pressure and the guy had nowhere to throw. That's what happens when everybody's doing the right thing."

Everybody continued to do the right thing when the Packers took a 14-0 lead over the Eagles the following week in Philadelphia. It wouldn't be that easy, however. Starting late in the first half, when Philadelphia stopped Green on a fourth-and-goal from the 1-yard line, an improbable series of plays took the suspense that had been building for weeks and multiplied it exponentially.

Late in the game, coach Mike Sherman declined to go for it on fourth-and-1 near the Eagles' 40, instead choosing to punt. The Packers pinned the Eagles deep in their own territory, but let them off the hook when Donovan McNabb completed a 28-yard pass to Freddie Mitchell on fourth-and-26. That led to David Akers' game-tying field goal with 5 seconds left.

Just minutes into the overtime, Favre's ill-advised deep pass — seemingly his first mistake in a month — was intercepted by Brian Dawkins, which led to another Akers field goal and a 20-17 Packers loss.

Like the lightning bolt that ended the Hall of Fame Game in August, the rapid-fire series of plays in Philadelphia denied the Packers the storybook ending they had come to expect. This time, though, they thought the season ended prematurely.

"I can't tell you how disappointed I am right now," Sherman said. "I'm disappointed for our team. I know how hard they worked and I know how devastating this was. They fully expected to come in and win the football game."

Unfortunately, the final game didn't go according to the script. But after the must unpredictable season in recent Packers history, did anybody really think it would?

"You can't compare this to any other season," center Mike Flanagan said. "Blackouts, rain delays, Brett and his family, injuries — this season's been up and down all year."

The New Coaches

ROLAND RETURNS 30 YEARS LATER

▸ By Rob Demovsky, Green-Bay Press-Gazette

Mike Sherman's 2004 coaching staff has five significant changes from last season, but none should be strangers to anyone who has followed the Green Bay Packers for the last three decades.

Though the most publicized promotion was that of Bob Slowik from defensive backs coach to defensive coordinator, the four other moves have turned Sherman's staff into one of the most experienced in all of the National Football League.

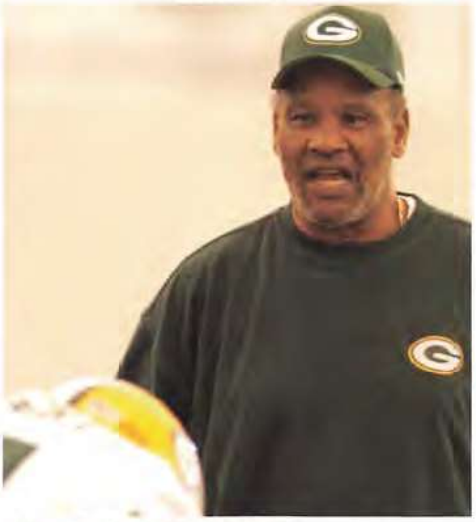
Consider this:

- New running backs coach Johnny Roland has already served 25 years in the NFL dating back to his first job with the Packers as a special assignment coach in 1974.

- New defensive backs coach Kurt Schottenheimer has 17 years of NFL coaching experience, including the last two in the Packers' own division as the defensive coordinator of the Detroit Lions.

- New offensive line assistant/quality control coach James Campen was the Packers' starting center for 42 of 48 games from 1990 to 1992. He replaced Joe Philbin, a long-time college coach who was promoted to tight ends coach after one season with the Packers.

Here's a look at each of the new assistant coaches:



JOHNNY ROLAND

Roland's NFL coaching career began in Green Bay under Dan Devine, who has Roland's college coach at Missouri, but Roland spent a large portion of his career coaching one of the greatest running backs in history — Chicago's Walter Payton. For 10 seasons, Roland was an important cog on the Bears' coaching staff.

Having been a Pro Bowl running back himself with the Arizona Cardinals in the late 1960s, Roland helped Payton become the NFL's all-time leading rusher.

For Roland, coming back to Green Bay was a chance to return to his coaching roots. However, little is the same in Green Bay this time around.

"The stadium was different, and there was no indoor practice facility like this," Roland said as he stood inside the Don Hutson Center. "Just the whole environment has changed. It's a great place. We can't use lack of facilities as an excuse."

KURT SCHOTTENHEIMER

The younger brother of San Diego Chargers head coach Marty Schottenheimer, Kurt Schottenheimer gives the Packers a third different assistant who has been an NFL defensive coordinators in addition to Slowik and current linebackers coach Mark Duffner.

Schottenheimer believes his experiences as a coordinator will help him now that he's working more closely with a specific group of players.

"I think one of the things that happens to you when you are a coordinator is it's very difficult to get hands on with the players at individual positions," Schottenheimer said. "That's what I love about coaching. I love doing that. I missed that part of it. I'm excited to be working with the guys play in and play out. You're not overseeing everybody. You've got a direct response and relationship with those guys in the secondary."

Schottenheimer said the biggest challenge of his new position is simply getting to know the players and their tendencies.

"It's a work in progress," he said. "You want to learn each guy and work with him that way you both feel most comfortable. There are good people here, and I think we'll have a very strong relationship. It's an on-going process, and I think as coaches and players you have to always strive to be better and know each other better."

JAMES CAMPEN

One of the Packers' most fiery and popular players in the early 1990s, Campen rejoined the Packers after a five-year run as a high school head coach in California.

What better job for Campen, the Packers' starting center when Brett Favre began his current NFL-record 189-game starting streak, than to work with the offensive linemen?

"I know my learning curve is going to be accelerated times 10," Campen said. "I'm anxious to see how it all works out."

Campen worked briefly with the Packers during the 1994 training camp, when he assisted former offensive line coach Tom Lovat, but he immediately went back to his native California and began his high school coaching career.

After last season, he got the bug to return to the NFL and contacted Sherman just to let him know he was available in case anything came up.

"I didn't have any idea there'd be an opening," Campen said. "I was talking to coach Sherman and expressed my interest in the NFL, and it went from there."

JOE PHILBIN

A career offensive line coach at the college level until he got his first taste of the NFL last year with the Packers, Philbin is about to embark on his first tight ends coaching job.

After spending last season as an assistant to offensive line coach Larry Beightol, Philbin's name was beginning to spread around the NFL. Several teams inquired about hiring Philbin, but he felt his future was with the Packers so he committed to staying – even if it meant returning as Beightol's assistant. Recognizing Philbin's talents, Sherman quickly promoted him to tight ends coach.

"It's really going to be challenging because for the last 15 years my main focus has been those five guys up front and protection and blocking schemes," Philbin said. "So far, it's been a good experience. In coaching, if you can change jobs but stay in the same city you're real lucky. I've enjoyed it so far."

Philbin said his reasons for wanting to remain in Green Bay were numerous.

"Number one, the organization is outstanding," he said. "Number two, coach Sherman. I have a lot of confidence in the program he's put together. Number three, the players. I think we have a lot of great players here. Number four, I think we can win a championship. We're not that far away. Those are four pretty strong reasons to stay here."

VINCE TOBIN

Another addition to the coaching staff was longtime NFL man Vince Tobin, who had been out of coaching since his stint as defensive coordinator of the Detroit Lions ended in 2001.

Sherman hired the 60-year-old Tobin as a special assistant in February. It's a new position on Sherman's staff, but one he felt was important because it meant adding a man of Tobin's vast experience. The former Arizona Cardinals head coach will help Sherman with big-picture issues like game-planning for certain opponents and studying trends of both the Packers and other teams.

"I think the job is going to evolve the longer I'm here," Tobin said. "To say it's going to be one specific thing, it's not like coaching a position."

Javon Walker

THROW IT TO '84'

▶ By Jason Wilde, Wisconsin State Journal

It seems so long ago now, those days when Brett Favre-to-Sterling Sharpe was virtually the Green Bay Packers' entire offense. He was a young quarterback back then, finding his way in a complicated scheme and needing a security blanket for those times when the play broke down and he was hell-bent on making something happen anyway.

These days, Sharpe is long since retired, working for the NFL Network and serving as a member of the media that he used to avoid. And Favre, now preparing for his 14th NFL season, has gone from a wild gunslinger who more than a few times was thisclose to coach Mike Holmgren yanking him to a rapidly graying elder statesman and future Hall of Famer.

It's funny, though, the way things always seem to come full circle, as Favre realized during the June minicamp when he recalled those Favre-to-Sharpe times.

"'When in doubt, throw to '84' — that was my motto back in the old days," Favre remembered. "And when we'd leave the huddle, (Sharpe) would say, 'Hey, if you ain't got nobody, throw it to me.' He said that all the time."

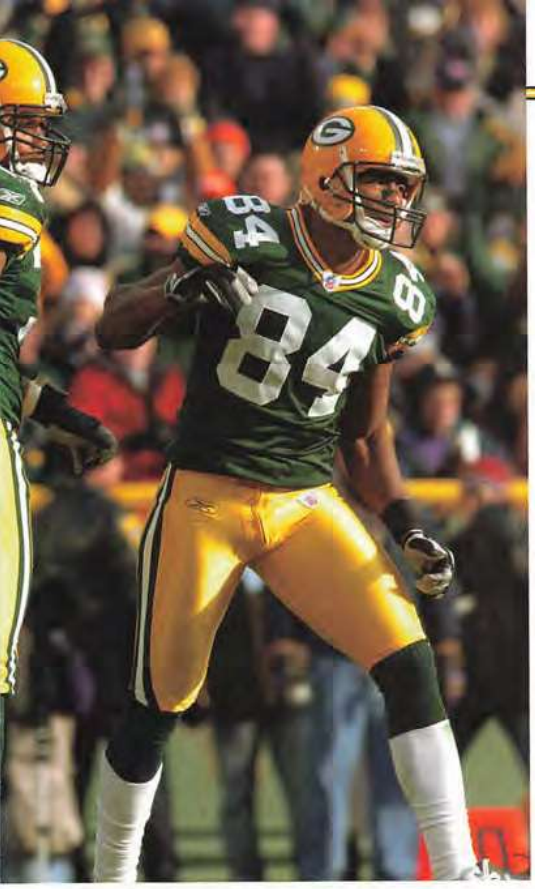
Well, 10 years later, it's 1994 all over again — sort of. Because as the Packers prepare for the 2004 season, the current No. 84, receiver Javon Walker, has developed into one of Favre's go-to guys after an impressive finish in 2003.

In fact, the 2002 first-round pick was brimming with so much confidence — maybe not a Sharpe-like cockiness, but definitely the self-assuredness that a big-time receiver needs — toward the end of last season that Favre said he even sounded a little like Sharpe at one point in the team's playoff loss to Philadelphia. It was right before Favre's 44-yard up-for-grabs heave to Walker set up Ryan Longwell's go-ahead field goal early in the fourth quarter.

"As we left the huddle he said, `Just throw it up, I'll make the play,'" Favre said. "And you're kind of thinking, 'I want to be a little more precise than that, I don't want to just throw it up.' It turns out, it looked that way, but he made the play. So the next time, it's like, `OK, I have confidence in this guy.'"

Enough confidence that the old throw-it-to-84 motto could be back in style?

"You know what? I feel that way now," Favre said, adding that he of course has similar confidence in Donald Driver and Robert Ferguson. "I think (initially) people maybe wondered, 'Who's Javon Walker? We're going to spend a first-round pick on this guy, how good is he?' I wondered myself. I've always been a little bit risky in my playmaking. It's nice to have someone on the other end.



"Now, within the framework of our offense, there are some plays where we can take shots. But you have to prove not only to the coaches but to your quarterback that you can make those plays."

Walker has proven it, both to his coaches — coach Mike Sherman and offensive coordinator Tom Rossley — and to Favre, which really began when he caught a 66-yard touchdown from Favre on the third play of the game vs. San Francisco on Nov. 23. In the final eight games (including playoffs), Walker caught 22 passes for a team-leading 555 yards and five touchdowns.

"From that San Francisco game on, I think he felt like he was supposed to make big plays," offensive coordinator Tom Rossley said. "If he can stay healthy, he's going to have a big year. I know that."

Walker does, too. He looks at his final numbers — 41 receptions for 716 yards and nine TDs in the regular season, six catches for 155 yards in two playoff games — and knows they could have been even more impressive had there been more downfield opportunities earlier in the year.

"I look at it as a great opportunity for me coming into this year for what our team can expect out of me early on given the opportunity," Walker said. "The coaches know what we can do. There's no excuse for us not to start off the way we ended last year. That's what I'm excited about."

In fact, while keeping in the all-for-one theme that Driver, Ferguson and Walker talk about at just about every turn, Walker admitted that he believes a Pro Bowl season is realistic for him.

"Because I look at it as, look at the season I had last year, which I don't think was my best season at all. I think if I get the opportunity, there's more to come," said Walker, whose yards-per-catch average (17.5) was second only to Dallas' Joey Galloway among NFL receivers with at least 25 receptions last season.

"It's every receiver's dream to go to the Pro Bowl. That's how you really solidify yourself as a receiver. I look at my stats last year with the yards and the TDs and the yards per catch, but I also look at some of the games, four or five games where I only had one catch. Maybe if in those games, what if there had been four catches? Five catches? Do the math. That may have put me over 1,200 yards, 12 touchdowns. That's Pro Bowl numbers."

But for his part, Walker says he isn't overly concerned about his statistics. He's more interested in making big plays that help the team win and continuing to earn the confidence of Favre and the coaches.

"I want to win, I want to go to the Super Bowl. I want to make plays and develop the trust factor from the coaches and my teammates so they know, 'Hey, here's the situation, let's go to Javon. He'll make that play,"' Walker said. "That's what my goal is. Everything that happened toward the end of last season, let's start off earlier with it."

Barnett becomes Big Dog OF DEFENSE

▶ By Todd McMahon, Green Bay News-Chronicle

Look who's barking now!

When Nick Barnett returned to Fontana, Calif., to catch up with family and friends for a few weeks this past winter, he was greeted with serenity. To say the least, it was a far cry from the rambunctious welcome awaiting him nine months earlier.

The then-21-year-old had some explaining to do when he reported for his first NFL minicamp with the Green Bay Packers. A reddish scar streaked along the cheekbone below his right eye, an unmistakable blemish on the baby face.

At first blush, it seemed Mr. Barnett had gotten himself into some trouble in the days that followed his first-round selection in the 2003 NFL Draft. As it turned out, he did, though it was nothing to the effect of trying to break up a skirmish on the playground and ending up as the unwitting victim of a glancing blow.

Barnett, instead, was knocked silly by the swinging gate of a fence he had just hopped. The incident that left him with the partial black eye interrupted Barnett's fleeing from an agitated Rottweiler, belonging to an aunt.

"It could have ended my career," Barnett would quip two days later, when he donned a Packers helmet and practice attire for the first time.

From that painfully dubious, if not amusing beginning, the makings of a promising pro career sprouted.

In the dog-eat-dog climate of the NFL, Barnett emerged as the Rottweiler of the Packers defense last season.

Ears pinned back.
Teeth clenched.
Foaming at the mouth.
Firmly standing on all twos, poised to pounce.

"The middle linebacker is supposed to be the most vicious guy on the field, running everywhere, making plays," Barnett explained. "You have the other team drawing up diagrams to try to stop you. That's where I want to be."

If Packers general manager and head coach Mike Sherman can help it, Barnett will be the centerpiece of the defense for many years to come.

Surely, one banner rookie year a legacy is not made. What Barnett accomplished in the space of a short four months, though, speaks well for what's to possibly come in the long run.

Staying in the present, Sherman expects bigger and better things from No. 56 in 2004.

"I think Nick Barnett will double what he did last year," Sherman proclaimed.

Considering Barnett amassed a team-high 134 tackles a year ago, that's mighty wishful thinking. However, Sherman was referring to a significant increase in productivity that isn't necessarily measured by a single number.

The promotion of defensive backs coach Bob Slowik to defensive coordinator in the off-season signaled an upgrade in defensive philosophy to all-out aggressive. The command word is "attack," which sits well with the insatiable linebacker who, like his coach, feels he can attain a lot more this season. Particularly behind the line of scrimmage.

"I didn't get enough sacks last year," said Barnett, who mustered only two. "We needed that pressure (on the quarterback), and I didn't get enough of that. I need some more of those tackles for loss.

"But, everywhere, I felt like I fell short. I feel I can improve in everything." In some regards, though, Barnett's proficiency as an NFL true freshman exceeded expectations, from Packers fans as well as teammates and coaches.

He was third in The Associated Press voting for the league's defensive rookie of the year, coupling the open-field tackling ability with nine pass breakups, including three interceptions.

No other rookie defender in the league had more tackles last year. Furthermore, only five other Packers rookies have reached the 100-tackle plateau in a season since the statistic was first kept by the team in 1975. Barnett's 134 were topped only by middle linebacker Rich Wingo's 166 in 1979.

Barnett led the Packers in tackles for a game five times, and he logged double-digit takedowns in seven games. It took him just three games to amass 15 tackles, achieving the current personal best Sept. 21 at Arizona.

Barnett's glistening performance that day in the searing 100-degree heat - and a series of stupendous efforts that followed - factored into the justification of Sherman's selecting this somewhat unknown with the 29th overall pick in the draft. As much as the Packers were desperate for a middle linebacker, the majority of draft pundits didn't foresee them filling the need with Barnett, a 6-foot-2, 235-pound outside linebacker considered too small to move inside.

Yet, on March 7, seven weeks before the draft, Sherman and linebackers coach Mark Duffner saw for themselves the answer to their most pressing dilemma on defense. They were on hand for Barnett's workout for NFL scouts on the Oregon State campus in Corvallis.

"You could see, with all of his teammates watching him, that this guy was the leader of this team," Duffner recalled. "Every drill, he tried to win; he went out of his shoes to compete.

"That's the kind of guy you want on your team, especially on your defense. You want a guy who is a fierce competitor who is going to try to win everything."

Later over dinner, Sherman and Duffner got to know the congenial, laid-back Barnett outside of football. By night's end, Sherman knew whom he wanted with the team's first-round pick.

After sitting nervously for the first few hours of the draft, crossing his fingers Barnett would be there for the taking, Sherman didn't hesitate when the Packers' turn came up in the mid-afternoon April 25.

"I would not take a linebacker in the first round who couldn't be on the field every down, and he's an every-down linebacker," Sherman would say a short time later.

A prophetic statement, to be sure. The coaching staff determined Barnett was on the field for 87.1 percent of the time when the Packers were on defense last year. His full-time duties for most of the season included serving as the lone linebacker in the dime (six defensive backs) package on passing downs.

Incidentally, Barnett's playing time, not to mention the potential for greater production, was diminished by a sprained right ankle. He missed a game and a half after sustaining the injury while leaping to celebrate a stop by the defense against San Francisco on Nov. 23 and then landing awkwardly on the foot of nose tackle Gilbert Brown.

Otherwise, Barnett refused to take time off. He also was a willing contributor on special teams, making four tackles.

"I don't like to be off the field. I like to be on the field," Barnett said. "If I could, I would play offense and defense. In high school, I never left the field. I was the only dude standing on the field (on a change of possession), waiting for everybody else to run out."

So, wherever the Packers wanted to position him upon his arrival last year, Barnett was game. The one-time strong safety proved the cynics wrong with the smooth transition to middle linebacker, hastened at that after Barnett couldn't participate in the second of two minicamps because school was in session at Oregon State at the time.

Duffner's first inclination was to try Barnett at weak-side linebacker, thus easing the indoctrination for the rookie.

"But, the head coach said, 'Hey, let's try him out at the toughest spot, at MIKE, first,'" said Duffner, adding with a big smile, "The head coach made a good move."

Like Baltimore's Ray Lewis and Chicago's Brian Urlacher before him, Barnett has proved modest size isn't a deterrent to being a playmaker in the middle. He plans to keep his weight at "a sound 233, 235" for the coming season, which is OK with Duffner.

Realizing he's not the biggest dog to play the position, Barnett is letting his supreme play do the barking.

Asserting that "my goal this year is to demolish what I did last year," the sign has been posted for opposing offenses to beware the middle linebacker who's developed a mean streak.

"I don't know if they know yet, but they're going to know soon," Barnett said. "The more comfortable I feel, the more I get into my character out there on that field and just be who I am, making plays. You have to be vicious. This is a vicious game."

Alone At The Top

LONGWELL PASSES FABLED HUTSON

▸ By Todd McMahon, Green Bay News-Chronicle

The unexpected phone call.

"Ryan, this is Dwight Clark." The dreaded six words that followed. "We're going in a different direction." They should have driven Ryan Longwell back down the street, left to lament what might have been and ponder a premature career change.

Oh, the recent college graduate did return to his parents' nearby home, downcast and seemingly at a crossroads in his 22-year-old life.

Thanks, though, to another phone call not long thereafter, there was little time for Longwell to either despair or stand in front of his bedroom mirror and weigh the consequences if he were to break it. His bags already packed, Longwell would be on an airplane the next day to Green Bay, Wisconsin.

As the Packers' up-to-date record book suggests, Longwell wasn't subjected to seven years of bad luck. The unassuming 6-foot kicker with the boyish looks considers himself the most fortunate resident from Bend, the small Oregon city nestled in the foothills of the Cascade Mountains.

"I still don't think I realize what being above Don Hutson really means," Longwell said this spring. "I know my name is above his. But, Don Hutson is such a storybook figure in the Packers' history. I don't think I'll really realize what happened until I'm done and away from football."

The fairy tale-like ascent to the top of the franchise scoring chart isn't expected to end anytime soon. Longwell hadn't turned 30, which he did this summer on Aug. 16, before he rendered the Hall of Fame name of Hutson second fiddle in one section of team annals. The most distinguished player to wear No. 8 with the green and gold enters his eighth NFL season with only one selfish goal in mind. "Obviously, I would like to keep putting it way out of reach these next few years," Longwell said.

Hutson's once-unbreakable record of 823 points stood for 58 years. Then along came Longwell to eclipse it last year with an extra point at San Diego on Dec. 14 and then put some distance between himself and the legend the last couple games of the regular season. The bar is temporarily resting at 844 points.

"I don't see him falling off anywhere in the near future," said John Bonamego, the Packers special teams coordinator who envisions Longwell taking the record to a plateau that will be off-limits for succeeding generations of kickers.

"As long as you can keep putting them through the uprights and putting points on the board, you're going to be playing for a long time."

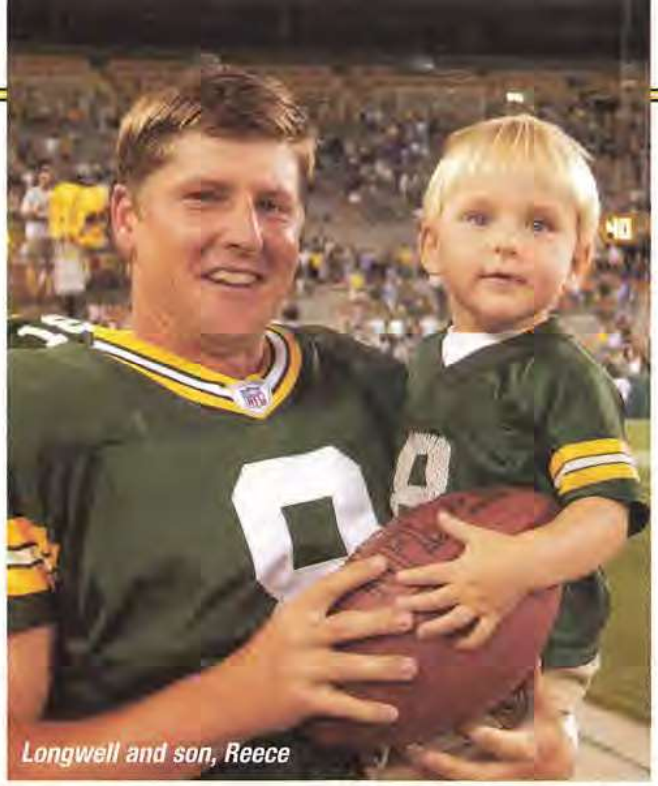
To Longwell's credit, he didn't let one rejection notice dash his dream of parlaying his booming right foot into a pro career, let alone a decorated one at football's highest level.

He has vivid memories of how all that could go wrong became right in a matter of 24 hours.

The morning of July 9, 1997, Longwell was kicking balls in a field at a junior high school mere minutes from his parents' house in Bend. It was one last time to limber up his leg before he would head back to San Francisco the following day to report for training camp.

However, Longwell got word during the workout that then-49ers general manager Dwight Clark needed to talk to him immediately via phone. Minutes later, Clark informed Longwell of his release from the team, which had signed him 2 1/2 months earlier as an undrafted rookie from the University of California.

"Right there on the practice field, in the middle of my kicking session, he tells me, 'We're going in a different direction,'" Longwell recalled.



Longwell and son, Reece

At that point, Longwell rounded up the footballs, returned home and started to wonder if he would be teaching English, in which he earned his college degree, and coaching baseball, his favorite sport, at alma mater Bend High School sooner than hoped.

All the while, he didn't bother unpacking the suitcase that was meant to go on the plane with him to San Francisco. Good thing, too, because he had only two hours' notice of an alternate flight booked for him July 10. This one would take him to Green Bay, after the Packers moved fast to claim him following a mandatory 24-hour stay on the waiver wire.

Longwell was aware the Packers had made the bold move of selecting Penn State kicker Brett Conway in the third round of the NFL Draft that year. Yet, along with the opinion raised by the 49ers that he wasn't good enough to hang with them, an impervious Longwell landed in a part of the country foreign to him with a deep conviction. He wasn't going to return to Bend without a kicking job in hand for the 1997 NFL season.

"Really, the only question I had was if the Packers would be willing to part with a third-round pick and go with me because I thought I had the talent, I thought I was good enough and I thought I matched up well with Brett," Longwell related.

Two weeks into the preseason, the confidence soared on Longwell's end. He saw the pressure Conway felt of trying to justify the team's using a high draft pick get the better of him. Conway missed four straight field-goal attempts, including all three in the second exhibition game against New England at Lambeau Field.

The following week, the burden indirectly exacted a heavy toll on Conway from a physical standpoint. He sustained a quadriceps injury during pregame warmups at Oakland.

"I remember Coach (Mike) Holmgren came up right before the game and said, 'You're kicking tonight. You have the whole game,'" Longwell said. "It was the break I needed, and, luckily, I took advantage of it."

To a T. Longwell made all 10 extra-point kicks and every one of his six field-goal attempts, including strikes of 50 and 49 yards in the preseason finale against the New York Giants in Madison. The Packers ultimately placed Conway on season-ending injured reserve and had no reservations going into the regular season with the kicker who wasn't drafted.

Longwell hasn't let them down. He's attained at least 100 points every season, one of only three kickers in NFL history to do so his first seven years. Denver's Jason Elam (last 11 years) and New England's Adam Vinatieri (last eight) also are working on current streaks. Moreover, Longwell's 844 points are the most in the league since 1997.

In all, he has nine team records. Besides overtaking Hutson for the scoring lead last season, Longwell surpassed predecessor Chris Jacke's field-goal benchmark of 173. He enters this season with 182 made.

What Longwell perhaps is most proud of is how he's nearly mastered the tricky and oftentimes wicked wind conditions at Lambeau Field, the self-proclaimed "toughest place to kick in the NFL."

Longwell made 23 of his 26 field-goal attempts in the regular season last year for a career-best conversion rate of 88.5 percent. Two of the misses fell just short of the crossbar, both on rainy days at Lambeau.

Little wonder he summed up the season as "my best year, consistency-wise, I've ever kicked the ball."

He remained in awe of it during the post-draft minicamp in late April, rehashing things with backup quarterback and invaluable holder Doug Pederson. Long snapper Rob Davis, who has been with the Packers since Longwell's rookie season, also is singled out for credit from the self-effacing kicker.

"Of all the field goals that we had, including the preseason last year and going all the way through the playoffs, we had 35 of 36 on line. If the distance is there, they're going through," Longwell said. "That's a pretty amazing stat in this day and age, especially kicking in Lambeau Field. All but one of them had a chance to go through!"

Having watched him get so close last season, Bonamego believes Longwell has the potential to achieve perfection for field-goal attempts in a season. It's what Longwell, who some feel hasn't been duly recognized throughout the league, may have to muster to realize his first trip to the Pro Bowl in Hawaii.

"That's what he expects of himself," Bonamego said of Longwell's aim of not missing. "He didn't get to be where he's at without a lot of hard work and confidence in what he's doing. He understands his self; he understands his technique and his swing."

What's more, the established veteran, who can see himself playing at least 10 more years into his 40s, understands what it's taken to make the remarkable climb from the base of the Cascade Mountains to the Packers mountaintop in a short time.

"You have to get a few lucky breaks and get some kicks that go through that are tougher ones. Fortunately, we've had most of those go through," said Longwell, glad he wasn't compelled to break the bedroom mirror seven years ago.

BUILDING A WINNER IN THE Information Age

▸ By Tom Andrews, Packer Report

Quick now. How many total plays, all teams combined, were run during the course of the entire 2003 NFL regular season? What? You don't know?

For the record, last season there were 41,738 total plays including special teams action and plays that were called back due to penalty. Maybe the average fan doesn't need to know that but it's this kind of detailed information that makes Mike Eayrs tick. Why? Because paying attention to such detail helps make the Green Bay Packers a better football team. As the club's Director of Research and Development, Eayrs manages databases and develops research reports for coaches, player personnel and management based on his analysis of statistical and tactical trends. He is a part of a team of specialists dedicated to using computer technology to gather every possible bit of information that could give the Packers an edge in today's ultra-competitive NFL.

Eayrs, who is now in his fourth season with the Green and Gold after spending the previous 16 years with the Minnesota Vikings, is quick to point out that the computer is merely a tool – a tool that will never replace the human mind. "Anything you can use a computer for, you can also do by hand," Eayrs explains. "Computer technology really doesn't improve anything a human can do. No one will ever replicate the human mind or human intelligence. Humans are more creative than computers, more intelligent than computers and one of the limitations of the computer is that it only does what you tell it to do. It can't take into consideration intuitive factors that people perceive much more clearly. I've never viewed the computer as a decision maker. The computer becomes a tool for what I call decision support. People make the decisions. Here at the Packers, Mike Sherman is the head coach and general manager and is a tremendous executive. His ability for organization and decision making is absolutely superb. Truthfully, I think he will out-decide the computer every time."

That decision support – the facts, figures, charts, graphics, spread sheets and simplified reports - is what Sherman decided he and his staff needed when he created Eayrs' position back in 2001. Sherman wanted to tap into Eayrs' wealth of analytical experience which went all the way back to his days as a high school coach in Winnebago, Minnesota and later as a college assistant coach at several schools including the University of South Dakota, the University of Wisconsin-La Crosse and Mankato State. It was in those formative years that Eayrs began to learn technology's true application to football. Specifically, Eayrs learned that a computer could improve the process of putting football teams together.

"The original programs we worked on dealt more with recruiting," said Eayrs, "but eventually we got into formation hit charts, and the thing that became the key to everything I do today: probability. We started looking at percentages of things happening when a certain stimulus occurred. If something happens 100 percent of the time, that means that every time you see 'X', 'Y' is going to follow. As a player, I played more defense than offense and I thought that one of the things that can really help you as a player is if you knew the probability of your opponent running or passing before the ball was snapped. If you were in a situation where you felt it was going to be a run, especially if you knew it would be an inside run, as a linebacker you'd cheat up to the line of scrimmage to take on the offensive linemen as quickly as possible and really constrict the area that the offense had to run."

Anybody who has a home computer can understand the essential value of this marvelous piece of technology. It helps us gather, store and disseminate information at incredible speed. Text. Photos. Graphics. Streaming audio and video. All capable of being transmitted in mere seconds to anywhere on the globe with the touch of a button or the click of a mouse. Likewise, the computer's biggest value to the football operation is the way it helps with redundant tasks. It saves the Packer staff hours and hours of time in recording information, from game strategy to player selection. Most of all, it allows the flexibility to re-organize and manipulate information much more quickly than can be done by hand. This has enormous implications during the NFL draft, for instance, when the team trades a pick and then has a completely new player need that must be met under a tight deadline.

The team behind the team

A peek at Eayrs' computer screen reveals a mind boggling array of databases geared to all aspects of football operations. Game analysis. Player personnel. Salary cap management. A complete breakdown of every play by every NFL team for the video archive. You might say that Eayrs is a part of the team "behind the team," guiding a flow of information to every decision maker in the building. Other members of this team include Wayne Wichlacz, Director of Information Technology, who is responsible for the overall planning for all networking, hardware and information systems; Mike Jelenic, Computer Systems Administrator, who handles administration of all information systems and databases; Danny Mock, College Scouting Coordinator, who coordinates the information process for player personnel; and Melanie Marohl, Salary Cap Analyst, who provides application support for the football personnel database.

Clearly, this is not your parents' NFL! Ever since 1993, when the new player collective bargaining agreement and free agency took effect, players have switched teams at a much higher rate than they used to. Add the complications brought on by salary cap restrictions and one can easily understand the difficulty today's teams face in sustaining a winner. To keep up with player movement, Eayrs has developed a database that includes every player who has entered the league since 1991. Next to an all-important player ID number is such key information as who originally drafted the player, their position, injuries, signing status and much more. "It's the golden arrow," says Eayrs with a chuckle. "When a player enters the league, he's assigned a league ID number. It's just like your social security number in the workplace. It follows you everywhere you go. With computer technology, this ID number becomes part of every file that exists in the NFL."

The college player database is equally comprehensive. As Sherman and his staff prepare for the NFL draft, they get a complete breakdown of each prospect that might fill a need, including the results of their performances at the NFL scouting combine. "We have all of their testing information, physically, emotionally and mentally from the combine," explains Eayrs. "We have their speeds, bench press reps, inches in a vertical jump, heights, and weights. We can take the combine information and, using their ID number, we can cross reference with their draft information and come up with a relational database. What you're doing is pulling in a lot of information from a lot of different areas and consolidating it into one place. We start to combine this information into tables and we end up with years and years of information corresponding to the players' ID number."

Information team also helps Sherman and his coaching staff put the draft into perspective when compared to drafts in years past. To accomplish that, statistics are used to develop "norm" tables, i.e. what are the norms in any given draft? "Basically, for each draft class, a team is going to draft eight players," said Eayrs. "Out of those eight, what all of our research shows, is that four are going to be unable, for one reason or another, to play in the NFL and they're basically either going to retire or be waived out of the league in their first three years. Unfortunately, due to free agency, the salary cap, etc., another player is going to be lost because you're going to be unable to bring him back. So now we're down to only three players. What the playing time statistics show us is out of these eight guys per team, two of them are going to go on to play half or more of the snaps in years two through four of their careers. They will become starters. We're going to find another guy who's going to play between 15 and 49 percent of the snaps and he's going to become what we call a role player. He won't be a starter but he's going to be very reliable in some type of a role like a third down receiver or an extra blocker as a second tight end."

Bear in mind that all of this is decision support information. Decision makers, like John Dorsey, Director of College Scouting, must combine this detailed information with their own intuition about a given player. "What I think technology does is it solidifies your intuitive feel about a player," said Dorsey. "I think the more logical facts that you have when you're building a case on a particular player, it gives you more concrete information to make those decisions. Then you combine that with your intuitive feel and all of a sudden, the logic of technology usually doesn't lie. But in football, because there are so many different variables involved, intuitiveness does become part of it."

For all its value, technology falls short with anything that involves creativity or intuition. That's where human instincts take over. "Once you meet a player, you'll know that football is important to him," adds Dorsey. "There's a very simple formula: how competitive is he, how much does he enjoy the game? Those are two variables that sometimes are vastly overlooked. Does he like the game of football? You can see that in a player five minutes from now. You can tell right off the bat what he's all about. That's an intuitive feel, human instincts."

Statistics vs. Human Instinct

In every draft, either because of a player's ability or out of necessity, one player is going to have to play right away and be on the field in half or more of his snaps as a rookie. Last year, that guy turned out to be linebacker Nick Barnett. Barnett is a prime example where both the statistics and the human instincts were correct. "We saw that he was a peak performer in everything he did and the way he went about life," said Dorsey. "Everything was right there. So why not pick him? You're not going to go wrong with those types of guys."

Ever evolving, it's impossible to predict what direction technology will take in the years ahead. In a perfect world, says Eayrs, the journey would eventually make its way to virtual reality for use as a teaching and evaluation tool. "If we could set it up so the person puts the helmet on and, essentially, by thinking, simulates playing the game and making the decisions that a quarterback or a linebacker or a primary receiver has to make, that would be outstanding. If you can build that kind of machine and put the Pro Bowl veteran into it and replicate his performance and then start bringing in prospects to see how they compare, it would be extremely valuable because that's how football operations people think. They compare prospects to players they are already familiar with. 'He reminds me of so-and-so.' Virtual reality would allow us to go from a categorical measure to an absolute measure where you can see exactly how close the prospect is to the peak performer."

The virtual reality machine may not be ready tomorrow. But you can bet information team will be—crunching the numbers and digging deep for that one minute detail that could spell the difference in a championship season.

Chad Clifton

THE HARD WORK PAID OFF

▸ By Tim Froberg, Green Bay News-Chronicle

Clifton's blind-side security for Favre was almost impeccable last season, but it paled in comparison to the physical battle he fought so ferociously during the off-season to protect a National Football League career that some feared was over.

The massive left tackle staged one of the more remarkable comebacks in franchise history to turn a career-threatening situation into a career-thriving scenario with the Green Bay Packers.

Clifton's chances of playing another snap in the NFL appeared cloudy after his life spun out control the afternoon of Nov. 24, 2002, when he suffered a devastating injury to his right hip at Raymond James Stadium. Clifton sustained severe damage to his pelvis where ligaments were torn and separated following a vicious blind-side hit by Tampa Bay's Warren Sapp on an interception return.

Clifton was taken by ambulance to a Tampa hospital where he sustained extensive bleeding in the pelvis. He remained hospitalized for more than a week, unable to walk and uncertain what his future held as a player.

Not only did Clifton return to the game, but he came back better than ever, putting together the finest season of his four-year NFL career. Instead of returning at mid-season like most assumed, Clifton, incredibly, was the only Green Bay lineman to play all 1,031 offensive snaps.

Clifton became a wall on the left side, allowing just one-half sack and only two pressures at the most critical pass-blocking position along the offensive line. His Pro Bowl-level play was a key reason why the Packers set a franchise record for least sacks allowed in a season (19), the second-lowest surrendered in the NFL.

"I definitely came back as a better player," said Clifton. "I've never worked as hard in the off-season, and that hard work paid off."

As a human shield for Brett Favre, Chad Clifton clearly knows how to protect.

Did it ever. The Packers rewarded Clifton in February, keeping him off the free agent market with a lucrative, six-year contract worth $32.35 million, including a $10 million signing bonus and a roster bonus of $1 million. The deal punctuated a remarkable reversal of fortune for the soft-spoken Tennessee native, who erased the question marks, took his career out of jeopardy and turned it into one of prosperity.

What made Clifton's chances of a full recovery so hazy was that his injury was a first in the NFL and the type usually seen in victims of car accidents.

"At first, I did question whether I'd be able to come back," said Clifton. "But once our doctors had a chance to talk with specialists around the country, they assured me this would heal and I would have a chance to come back. They just warned me that it would be a long, tough road."

It certainly wasn't a yellow brick road for Clifton. He was 26, but his battered body felt like it was 96. He was bedridden for more than two weeks, and had to literally take baby steps with his rehabilitation. Initially, he needed a walker to get around, before graduating to crutches and then a cane—a depressing situation for a professional athlete whose ability to sink his hips and slide his nimble feet allowed him to regularly win the dogged weekly duels between pass rusher and pass protector.

Clifton handled the pain the same way he handles a speed rusher—he blocked it out. "Just being able to walk again without crutches felt great," said Clifton, who took his first steps on his own almost six weeks after the injury. "As soon as I was able to walk, I started rehab and man, it was painful. All the muscles and ligaments were still torn, so I had to go through the whole process of rebuilding everything. Fortunately, I had a lot of good people around me that helped me push through it."

Packers assitant strength and conditioning coach Mark Lovat, head trainer Pepper Burruss, assistant trainer Bryan Engel and fellow offensive tackle Mark Tauscher, who was also rehabbing last winter from a major knee injury, worked closely with Clifton to rebuild his body. But Clifton says that no one worked harder to facilitate his comeback than his wife Candi, a former high school sweetheart whom he married earlier in 2002.

"She was really the angel on my shoulder," said Clifton, who lost 25 pounds through the whole ordeal. "She was with me every day. Those first few weeks while I was in a hospital bed, I couldn't do anything on my own, and she had to wait on me hand and foot. It was no easy task for her. I definitely tested her patience. As tough as this was, it would have been a lot tougher without her."

Clifton, an easy-going, low-key individual, never lashed out at Sapp for the injury-causing hit, which he never saw coming while giving chase following an interception by Tampa Bay's Brian Kelly. Sapp delivered a legal block on the play, but it was also unnecessary considering that it came about 30 yards away from the play.

Sapp's controversial hit drew the wrath of Packer players, coaches and fans, and Sapp didn't help matters by not bothering to call Clifton or visit him in the hospital.

"I won't be calling him to come up to my house for a birthday part or anything, but I don't harbor any ill feeling toward Warren Sapp," said

Clifton. "I still think it was a cheap shot, but it was a legal shot. You play the game and you've got to assume those risks. Those kind of plays happen every day in the league. Unfortunately, I was injured."

Offensive line coach Larry Beightol added: "Chad is a classy young man and he handled that whole situation like a pro. Instead of talking about it, he did everything he could to get back on the field."

The injury broadened Clifton's perspective about an NFL career which he admittedly took for granted.

"You definitely come out of it with a new appreciation for the game," said Clifton. "You realize it all could be taken away any play, with one hit, one play and your career could be over."

As if he didn't have enough trouble, Clifton also had minor off-season surgeries on a knee and an elbow, which further diminished his chances of returning by opening day. However, Clifton beat considerable odds by lining up at his customary left tackle spot in the Sept. 7 season opener against Minnesota—9½ months after he crashed to the turf in Tampa Bay. Clifton played relatively pain-free all season, and the hip held up surprisingly well.

"I wasn't 100 percent at the start of the season, but by the third game or so, I felt pretty good," Clifton said. "The hip is fine. It actually feels 100 percent. I never had anything other than the normal aches and pains.

Beightol called Clifton's season "outstanding" and wasn't shocked that the big man had such a big season.

"Knowing Cliffy's work ethic and his want-to, I wasn't surprised that he was able to come back so strong," said Beightol. "I thought he brought up his level of play. He was much more confident in the things we were doing last year."

The 6-foot-5, 330-pound Clifton improved as a run blocker last season and polished his extraordinary pass-protection skills to the point that getting past him was tougher than breaking through barbed wire. Clifton, a former high school basketball player, has exceptional feet, fine athleticism and most importantly, he is technically sound.

"The biggest thing with Chad is that he's a great technician," said offensive guard Marco Rivera. "He knows how to block, when to block and where his help is coming from. He's a prototypical left tackle."

Clifton wasn't always so eager to block. He began his football career as a tight end, a position he played his first two years in high school before being switched to left tackle.

"After my sophomore year, my coach pulled me aside and told me that I was going to be an offensive lineman in college, so he was switching me to left tackle," recalled Clifton. "I wasn't too happy about it. I liked catching passes and scoring touchdowns. But looking back, it was the best thing that could have happened to me."

Clifton grew up in Martin, Tenn., a small town of roughly 12,000 in the northwest corner of the state, about two hours from Memphis. The youngest of five children, Chad's father is a butcher, while his mother works for the local school district.

"My parents instilled in me good, basic values," said Clifton. "I didn't really speak out about the whole Warren Sapp thing and part of that was because of what they taught me about not holding resentment toward people.

"I had a really good childhood. Football is like a religion in the south and it's no different in Martin. On Friday night, the lights are on at the football field and everyone in town is there."

His small-town background was one of the reasons that Clifton instructed his agent to do whatever it took to strike a deal last winter to keep him in Green Bay. Had he entered the free agent market, he likely would have landed an even more lucrative contract.

"Oh man, I absolutely wanted to stay," Clifton said. "I was so excited to get it done. My wife and my parents, they couldn't see me in another uniform. It's amazing how well everything has worked out, but even with the injury, I had a good sense that things were going to work out."

Sapp is now a Raider, Clifton has hit the financial jackpot and the Packers don't have to worry about the left tackle position for years.

The nightmare in Tampa has faded, and Clifton couldn't have dreamed up a better ending to a once-harrowing episode.

Susan Broberg
KEEPS THE COACH ON SCHEDULE

▶ By Sean Schultz, Green Bay Press-Gazette

Susan Broberg doesn't play the game of football, but she sure works at it. Her job as administrative assistant to Mike Sherman, the Green Bay Packers' vice president, head coach and general manager, sees her running interference for the head man, blocking passes for his time when he can't be interrupted, and serving as his special team of one at the office.

Her job involves far more than taking a memo or answering the telephone. She has the daunting task of keeping the man who is both coach and GM of America's favorite football franchise on schedule, and it's a schedule with little letup year-round.

Broberg will enjoy her 10th season with the Packers this fall. She came to work for former Coach Mike Holmgren in 1994, stayed through Ray Rhodes' stint as coach in 1999 and kept her post when Mike Sherman took over in 2000.

Her job description puts Broberg into a very exclusive clique. "Only 31 other people in the country have the job I do," she said. "It's really a specialized club." She and the other administrative assistants for pro football's coaches keep in touch via e-mail and telephone. "We have a network with each other," Broberg said. "We understand about coaching changes."

Broberg learned the hard way that "things change so much in this industry, and when they change, they're wholesale changes. We had two complete turnovers in two years' time. That was tough."

Sherman helped make it a smooth transition and Broberg soon settled into his style. Besides preparing Sherman's schedule, she handles his correspondence, prepares his material for meetings, assists with his speeches and helps him with the books he needs to keep during the season. "Keeping up with the flow of paperwork is a tough job," she admits. "It's knowing what he'll want to see, previewing things for him, scanning resumes, even scanning the local press clips."

Last season she enjoyed an expanded role, traveling to some away games when the laminated sideline sheets that hold the offensive game plan needed to be finished on the road. "I've been able to be in the draft room with them the last few years and see how that all plays out," Broberg added. She's gotten to watch game film, and when draft-eligible college players come to town, she shows them around the stadium with pride. "I know no place can compare to this," she said.

Broberg, now 37, earned a bachelor's degree in business at St. Norbert College in 1989 before going into the hospitality industry. She left it for football, bringing her business and customer service skills from the Radisson Hotel and Conference Center where she was corporate sales manager.

At the Radisson, "the Packers were my account," she recalled. "When Mike Holmgren's secretary retired, his football assistant asked me if I knew anybody for the job. I said, 'Where do I sign up?'"

That customer service background has served her well. "I deal with so many people externally and internally and I use that a lot," Broberg said.

"I give him (Sherman) big chunks of time where he can concentrate on the team... If he wants to take time for lunch or to work out, he can do that."
– Broberg

"I try to make everybody feel they're a number one priority." She realizes her own responsibility. "You're the first impression everyone inside the building and outside the building get of the coach and GM."

But Sherman is her main priority and her goal is making sure his life runs with few interceptions. "He lets me make his schedule," she said. "He trusts me not to over-commit him." She doesn't just see to it that Sherman keeps his appointments and meets with his staff. "I give him big chunks of time where he can concentrate on the team. . .If he wants to takes time for lunch or to work out, he can do that."

Broberg said she has no trouble being the bearer of bad news when the coach can't meet with someone. "I do it with a smile and let the people know they're still a priority," she said. "They call me the gatekeeper; they have to know the password. I can help him filter out and prioritize and do the things he needs to do. He lets me filter out the fluff."

As administrative assistant, she's had the unique experience of watching three coaches in action at Lambeau Field. She's appreciated the particular style of each of them. "Working for Coach Holmgren was the only way I knew how to do things," she said. When Sherman came on board, she recognized some of his traits as those he learned from Holmgren and from his work at Texas A & M. "But Coach Sherman has been so innovative and creative. He's done things that really benefitted this team. . .He's made this team his own."

Sherman, with his triple title, has even more work to handle than his predecessors did. "It's hard for him to delegate and when he does, it's a big honor. He's given me more responsibility than either of the two previous coaches."

Broberg has her own Packers fan club in Stevens Point – her parents, Bob and Bette Kluck. Her dad turned his only child into a Packers fan at a tender age. "For one of my first Christmases I got a Packers helmet and I didn't take it off for a week," she said. Her parents had season tickets and the Packers used to train across the street from her home when she was young. "Some of my best memories are of driving to Green Bay in the fall for games," she said. "I grew up hearing about (Paul) Hornung and (Bart) Starr." Now she's personally familiar with current star athletes like Brett Favre and former Green Bay personnel who went on to become NFL head coaches, men like Dick Juaron, Steve Mariucci and Andy Reid. "Such outstanding people are really a tribute to this organization," she said. "It's fun to see them be successful."

Now the Klucks have an insider at Lambeau Field and she has expanded the place she calls home. "Not having a big family myself, the people here are like brothers and sisters," Broberg said.

She keeps close ties at the Radisson still, particularly with the man she married, husband Lance Broberg, the hotel's general manager.

On their free time, the Brobergs like to golf and travel. She's a reader and a scrapbook enthusiast who is finishing her scrapbook on the renovation process at Lambeau. Typically, it's so thorough it even includes a sample of the sand from the groundbreaking ceremony.

Broberg wears a brilliant Super Bowl XXXI ring on her finger, a reminder of Holmgren's era that came after the Packers' 1997 victory over New England. She's equally proud of her name on a plaque with the other staffers inside the Lambeau Atrium.

"To have my name on the plaque, a permanent piece in the Packers' history, is something few get to experience," Broberg said.

JACKSON FINDS

Greener Grass

IN GREEN BAY

▶ By Peter Jackel, Racine Journal Times

On a typical early November day in Green Bay, when the last warmth of autumn is losing another tug-of-war with the approaching winter and the richly green hues are fading to a dull brown, Grady Jackson never saw so much lucious, green grass.

Preparing for a tour of Green Bay in an SUV driven by Reggie McKenzie, the Packers' Director of Player Personnel, Jackson found himself on the other side of the proverbial fence in the quaint, cozy atmosphere of Green Bay, where the grass really was greener from his perspective.

That was supposed to be the case 18 months earlier, when the massive free-agent defensive tackle spurned a serious overture from the Packers to sign an 11th-hour deal with the New Orleans Saints. It was a decision that went against his better judgment and it was a decision that ultimately melted down into career-threatening disaster.

"I had the opportunity to come to Green Bay and I wish I would have taken the opportunity to come here in the first place," said the 31-year-old Grady Jackson, a sixth-round draft choice of the Oakland Raiders in 1997. "Sometimes, the grass isn't always greener on the other side and I found that out. And now I'm very happy in Green Bay."

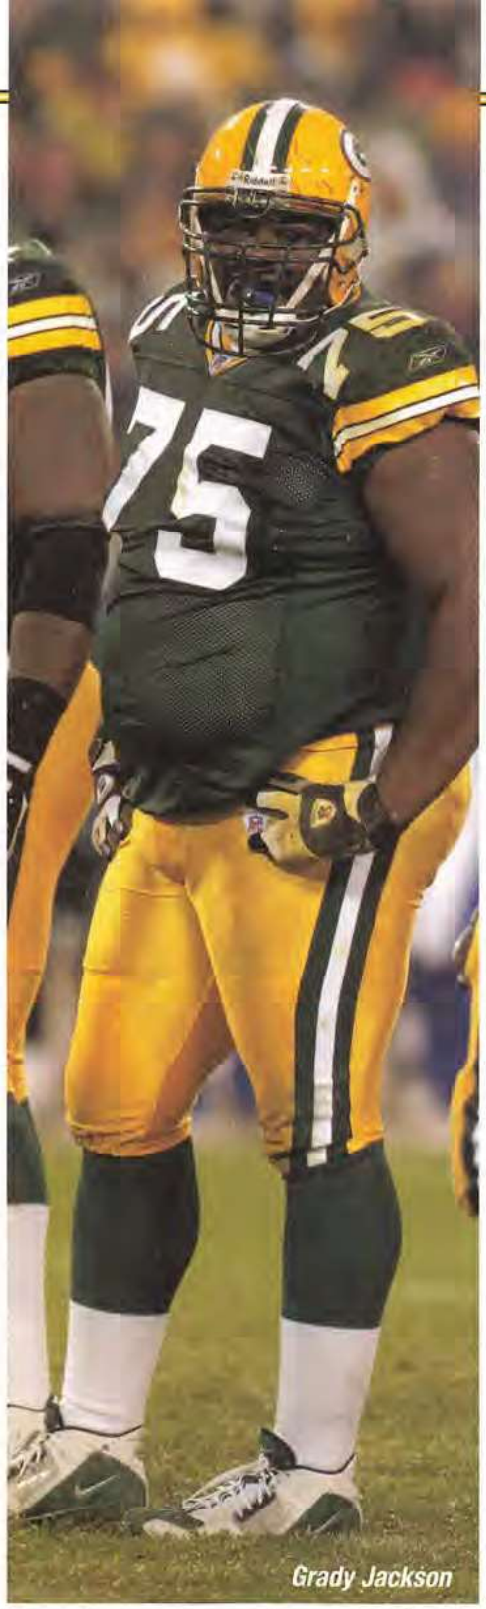
"My agent (Bus Cook, who also represents Packers quarterback Brett Favre) was calling and telling me about all kinds of teams that wanted me. When Green Bay came calling, maybe that was destiny for me to be there in the first place and I feel opportunity came knocking again.

"So I just took the opportunity to go to Green Bay because, when you look at it with the history they have there and the football legends and playing with Brett and Ahman Green, that's real special. You're not going to get too many opportunities to play with Hall-of-Fame quarterbacks and running backs like that."

Talk about a feel-good story.

From Jackson's perspective, he was given the chance to re-focus and re-energize himself after feeling this his talents were wasted in New Orleans. Playing in a read-and-react defense under Saints coach Jim Haslett that was at odds with his comfort zone, 6-foot-2, 330-pound Jackson gradually fell out of favor with the organization.

From the Packers' perspective, that somewhat roly-poly man who toured Green Bay with McKenzie upon his arrival last Nov. 5 represented the salvation to their season. Gilbert Brown, who was supposed to be placed on the injured reserve list during the preseason with a ruptured right biceps, was struggling to be effective and Rod Walker, who was spelling him at nose tackle, had just been lost for the season with a knee injury.



Grady Jackson

The Packers were 4-4 at the time and in danger of suffering another late-season flame-out, just as they did the previous season. Somehow, McKenzie and Vice President of Football Operations Mark Hatley had to come up with a miraculous solution to present to their boss, Packers coach and general manager Mike Sherman, as another season hung precariously in the balance.

"We were a little thin and we knew we needed to somehow get someone else to come in and kind of pick up from where the guys who got injured left off," Packers defensive line coach Jethro Franklin said. "But I had confidence in Reggie McKenzie, Mark Hatley and Coach Sherman to get a quality guy who was a quality guy who could go out and do a good job."

Did they ever. It was as if three bananas lined up in a Las Vegas slot machine and riches beyond what the Packers could have imagined came tumbling out.

How vital to the Packers was Jackson, who made his debut with the Packers against the Philadelphia Eagles last Nov. 10? Consider that in the Packers' eight regular-season games prior to Jackson's arrival, they allowed an average of 117.2 rushing yards per game, 4.4 yards per carry and seven touchdowns. And in the eight regular-season games in which Jackson came off the bench to plug the middle, the Packers allowed an average of 95.4 rushing yards per game, 3.8 yards per carry and three touchdowns.

The bottom line is this: Prior to when Jackson signed, the Packers were limping through the season with that 4-4 record, two games behind the Minnesota Vikings in the NFC North Division. And after the big man arrived to clog what had been a porous interior defense, they won six of their final eight regular-season games to overcame the Vikings by one game for the division championship.

Bargain-basement pickups don't come any better than this.

"I'm sure anytime you're in a situation he was in where you were released by a team and go to a playoff-contending team, shoot, that's enough to rejuvenate you alone," Franklin said. "He had some big games when he came in."

Take last Dec. 14 against the Chargers at San Diego, when Jackson overpowered center Cory Raymer and sacked quarterback Drew Brees. Hannibal Navies recovered the loose ball at the Chargers' 1-yard line and the Packers scored one play later en route to a 38-21 victory.

There was a sack of Chicago Bears quarterback Kordell Stewart Dec. 7, setting up a touchdown two plays later in the Packers' 34-21 victory. And there was his six tackles in a 31-3 victory over the Denver Broncos Dec. 28, among several other strong performances.

For the season, Jackson finished with 2.5 sacks (which tied for third on the Packers even though he only played half the season with them), 25 tackles and one forced fumble. Playing on a defense which Jackson felt maximized his ability, he once again produced in a big way.

"Sometimes the grass isn't always greener on the other side and I found that out. And now I'm happy in Green Bay."
– Grady Jackson

"I like the defense because it's just like when I was with the Raiders," Jackson said. "I like just attacking and making plays. That's the type of defense I need to be in instead of the read defense. That doesn't work well with me.

"With the Saints, it was more of holding them off the linebackers. They won't let you be your natural self and just play football. They want you play the way they play and if you look at it, it's not a great defense.

"They're always slanting you and looping you outside and I feel there's a disadvantage to doing all these slants away from the play and trying to let the cornerbacks and linebackers make the tackles.

"Just let the inside guy get off the ball and be physical."

Everything added up for Jackson in Green Bay, which explains why he signed a two-year contract with the Packers last Dec. 27. After allowing this opportunity to slip away once before, he wasn't going to make this same mistake twice.

And now that Jackson is satisfied, look for this upswing to continue for the Packers this season.

"I feel real great, but I owe some of it to my teammates in Green Bay," Jackson said. "When I came here, we all had the attitude to play as one person on the field and we just played with one heartbeat rather than 11 different heartbeats. I feel if we play together, we can win together."

'GRAY GHOST' WAS A PACKER FOR ALL SEASONS

▶ By Bud Lea, Packer Plus Columnist

It was really easy to recognize the Green Bay Packers in 1949.

The Green Bay Packers wore No. 3. The Green Bay Packers were about 5 feet 11 inches tall, weighed 190 pounds, had an easy smile and gray hair.

Most teams had 40 players in their game plan that year. The Green Bay Packers were going to try to get by with one.

You talked to opponents and all they talked about was Tony Canadeo. They seemed to have as much trouble as the rest of the National Football League remembering who the other guys on the Green Bay team were - or if there were any.

You heard people talk and you got the impression Green Bay must have gotten the rest of the team out of the Yellow Pages. You got the confused notion that Canadeo, then 30 years old, did not need blockers because nobody ever mentioned them.

There are millions of stories in the NFL. There was only one story in Green Bay that year.

In 1949, the Green Bay Packers were a gosh-awful football team. Curly Lambeau would depart as head coach after a 2-10 finish.

The Packers were depleted of talent because of the retirements of the magnificent Don Hutson and many other stars. They got hammered in almost every game. They lost games by lopsided scores of 17-0, 48-7, 39-17, 35-7, 24-3, 30-10, 30-7, 41-21, and 30-0.

Teams would stack their defenses to stop the run because the Packers couldn't throw the ball. That's what made Tony Canadeo's accomplishments even more astonishing.

During that turbulent 1949 season, the Gray Ghost of Gonzaga - as he was affectionately called by the fans - did something no running back had done at Green Bay. He broke the 1,000-yard barrier by rushing for 1,052 yards on 208 carries for a 5.1-yard average. And he did it in 12 league games, not 16 as they play today.

Tony Canadeo didn't have the God-given talent of Paul Hornung or Ahman Green. He had to work hard to play the game well. He played for the love of the game and when $175 a game was a respectable wage.

When Canadeo came into the league in 1941, the NFL didn't know what to make of him. Neither did Lambeau, his coach, nor his team, the Packers.

Here was a happy-go-lucky character out of Chicago who went to a small Jesuit college in Spokane, Wash. He had a prematurely gray head of hair that made him look older than his 23 years, a wide-eyed, almost-innocent stare, and he was afraid of nothing.

He was so far removed from the stereotype of a pro football player – the charismatic Don Huston, the calculating Cecil Isbell, the silent Andy Uram – that they figured he didn't understand the situation. He was just another rookie.

He never went to Notre Dame or Michigan. He honed his game at Gonzaga. When they heard that, they concluded he was over his head.

Tony had a few things to learn – like rookies were seen and not heard. That Lambeau was an iron-clad ruler, and it was his way or the highway when you negotiated a contract; that the Packers were one of the true powerhouses of the NFL; that he was lucky to have a job with them.

By the time he made the team, being a seventh-rounder in the 1941 draft, he was ready to run. Run for daylight. Run for touchdowns. Run for office. You name it, and he was ready to run for it.

He laughed along with everybody else, and he played, he hustled, and he followed orders. He went on to become one of the most beloved Packers and perhaps the greatest pound-for-pound running back in Green Bay history.

"The first time I saw Tony was at training camp in Green Bay," former teammate Billy Grimes said, recalling when he joined the Packers in 1950. "There was a crowd gathered around the field when we got there and somebody said, 'Who's that?' and I said, 'I don't know, some old man down there.' All I saw was his white hair."

Canadeo played 11 years with the Packers and totaled 4,197 career rushing yards. A durable, all-purpose halfback, he was an accomplished blocker, capable passer, good receiver in addition to being a highly effective return man. He also was the team's punter, and played defensive back during the early years of his career.

Red Cochran, a former Green Bay assistant coach and current scout, played against Canadeo in three regular-season games and one scrimmage as a member of the Chicago Cardinals. He remembers Canadeo scrapping and even crawling for yards at a time when the rules required the defense to pin a ball carrier to the ground to end play. In Cochran's one scrimmage against Canadeo's Packers, Canadeo knocked him out with a knee to the head when Cochran tried to tackle him.

"He was kind of a little guy," Cochran said. "He wasn't a power back, so he did it with quickness and moves. He was a natural running back. I just remember him as a guy we always had to be ready for. You knew when playing against him he was tough to get down. You don't run for 1,000 yards back in those days without being a guy who doesn't give up."

Canadeo's best years on the field came during some of the Packers' worst times. He played for Lambeau from 1941-'43 and then went off to serve in World War II. When he returned, he began to flourish as a halfback in Lambeau's Offense, Finishing in the top five in the NFL in rushing from 1947-'49, despite the team posting records of 6-5, 6-5-1 and 3-9.

Some people still think Canadeo was the best running back the Packers ever had. He is the team's fourth all-time leading rusher with 4,197 yards. He led the team in rushing in '43, '46, '47, '48, and '49.

He was the second Green Bay player to have his number (3) retired, following in the footsteps of the great Don Huston.

Canadeo was elected to the Wisconsin Athletic Hall of Fame and the Packer Hall of Fame in 1973. And the following year, he made the Pro Football Hall of Fame in Canton, Ohio.

After his retirement as a player in 1953, Canadeo served as a television broadcaster on Packers games along with Ray Scott. He always had a smile on his face. He was unfailingly friendly and never said a bad word about the Packers.

Canadeo was named to the team's ruling executive committee in 1958. He was instrumental in hiring Vince Lombardi as coach and general manager the following year. He was Lombardi's most trusted friend.

He knew every inside story of every hiring and firing at Green Bay from Lombardi to Mike Holmgren, and there was never a better source for stories. When I was covering the team for the Milwaukee Sentinel I used to call him for information about coaching changes, Tony always begged off, saying, "C'mon, Bud. I can't comment on that." He would say it in such a sincere and convincing way that you never could get mad at the guy.

Canadeo never had a sick day in his life. But 32 years ago, his kidneys shut down, and twice a week he would travel back and forth from Green Bay to Veterans Hospital in Milwaukee to be hooked up to a dialysis machine. After seven months of dialysis, Tony prayed for a transplant. All five of his children stepped forward as donors, and after extensive testing, Bob, a Vietnam veteran, was the best match, and the successful surgery was done.

Three years ago I visited Tony. He lived about a mile and a half from Lambeau Field in a beautiful home he shared with his wife, Ruth. When I called for directions, he said with a laugh, "It's easy. Ask anybody where the dumb Italian lives, and they'll know."

It was kind of sad to see Tony. He couldn't walk or drive a car. He no longer went to games at Lambeau because he didn't want to inconvenience anyone for help. For a man who lived his life in pro football, this was the hardest thing.

The den in Canadeo's home could have been a museum wing or a tourist attraction. Pictures, plaques, trophies, awards and momentous. Pictures of No. 3. Pictures of the Lambeau years and the Lombardi years. Game balls.

On a November Sunday in 1949, Canadeo gained 122 yards on 20 carries against the Chicago Cardinals at Comiskey Park. Asked if he would do it again despite all of his medical problems, he said, "Hell, yes."

Time finally ran out on Tony last Nov. 29. He died of an aneurysm at the age of 84.

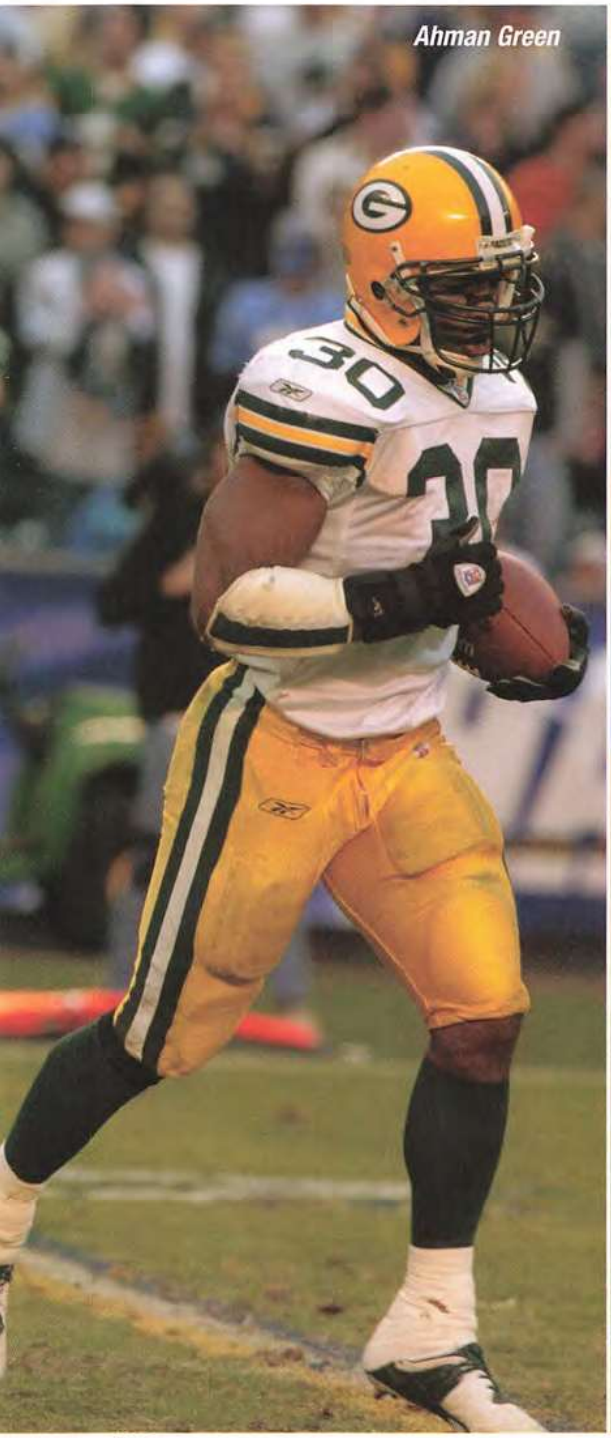
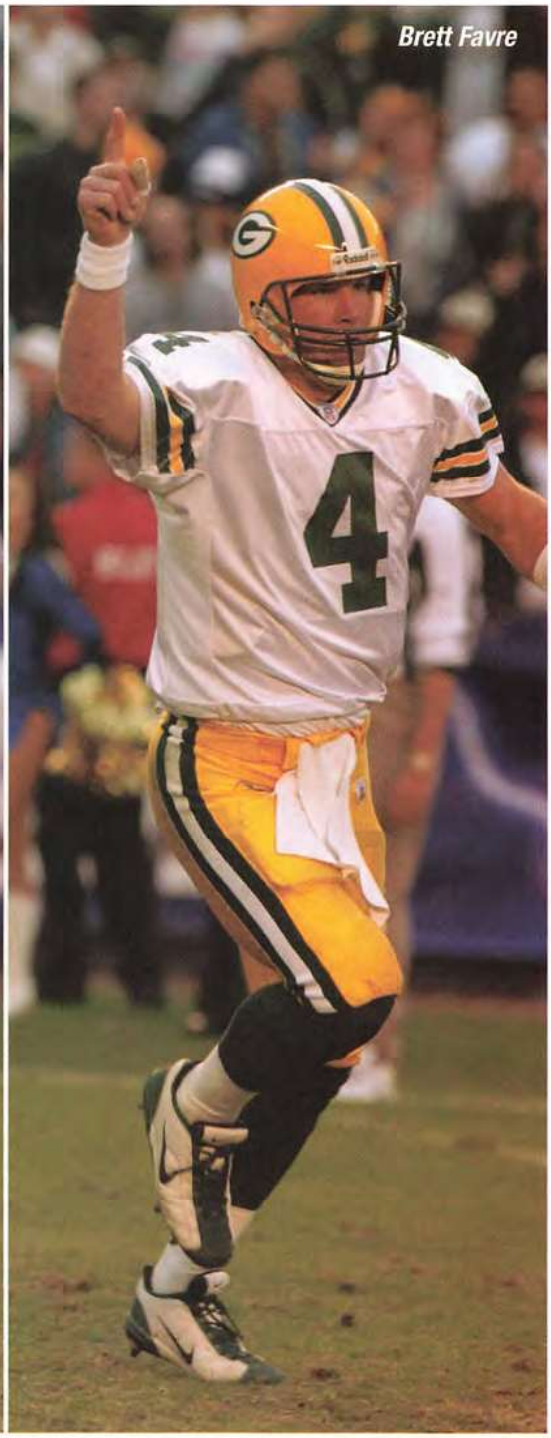
Record-Breaking Day

WEEK 15 REMEMBERED

▶ By Bud Lea, Packer Plus Columnist



Ahman Green



Brett Favre

Week 15 of the National Football League's 2003 season will be remembered for three things:

- There was the fact the Green Bay Packers traveled to San Diego and surrendered 424 total yards to the down and out San Diego Chargers, but rallied with three touchdowns in the fourth quarter to beat the Chargers, 38-21, and keep their playoff chances alive.
- There was the fact that two hours earlier, at Soldier Field, the Chicago Bears, with no chance to make the playoffs and with a rookie quarterback starting his first game, upset the division-leading Minnesota Vikings, 13-10 and allowed the Packers to pull into a first-place North Division Tie with the Vikings.
- And there was the fact three Packers, who were marching toward history, rewrote the Green Bay record book.

You knew it was going to happen. You knew these players were very capable to break individual team records that had stood the test of time.

You knew this was coming, all right, but you didn't know running back Ahman Green, quarterback Brett Favre and placekicker Ryan Longwell all would smash team records in the same game.

With thousands of cheeseheads in the crowd of 64,978 at Qualcomm Park chanting "Go, Pack, Go," Green, Favre and Longwell broke records that had stood for 41-, 61-, and 58-years, respectively.

Green needed just 12 yards to break Jim Taylor's single-season mark of 1, 474 yards that had been in the books since 1962. He surpassed Taylor with his fourth carry, a nine-yard run on the Packers' seventh play from scrimmage, then followed that with a 4-yard touchdown run to cap the opening drive. Green finished the day with 75 yards on 19 carries.

"It has lasted for a long time, from what I know," Green said of snapping Taylor's record. "It is just something where I take my hat off to my O-linemen, the guys that have been blocking for me for the past four years. Guys like William Henderson, Bubba Franks, Mike (Whale), Marco (Rivera), Mike (Flanagan), Mark (Tauscher), Kevin (Barry), they know who they are."

The Next record to fall occurred in the second quarter. Favre fired a 7-yard touchdown pass to Donald Driver with 33 seconds left in the first half. It marked the 23rd straight game he had thrown for a touchdown.

The original mark of 22 was set by Cecil Isbell in the 1941 and '42 seasons. The all-time league mark is 47 games set by Hall of Famer Johnny Unitas.

"I don't think he has anything to worry about," Favre said of Unitas' record. "It's so damn hard to throw a touchdown in one game, better yet 47 or whatever, I'm just happy to still be throwing them and still be taking snaps for this team. I think people who watch realize that. There are just some records that are not to be broken, and that's one of them."

Favre threw three more touchdown passes in the fourth quarter to wipe out the Chargers' 21-17 lead.

The last mark to fall was the Packers' all-time points, record. Don Hutson's franchise mark of 823 points had stood since 1945. Longwell entered the game needing three points to pass Chris Jacke's 820 points and six to pass Hutson's mark.

With a 32-yard field goal and two conversions in the first half, Longwell had equaled Hutson's mark. The record-breaker came on an extra point following Robert Ferguson's 40-yard touchdown catch early in the fourth quarter.

Coaching Green, Favre and Longwell, three players who hold team records for one of the most storied franchises in all of sports, was especially rewarding for Mike Sherman.

"They're special men," Sherman said. "The thing that I'm most proud of is how each of those men handled the record. They're all humble. They're all very respectful of the past and the people that held the records."

The Packers coach discovered this when talking to Longwell. "I'm coming up from practice and you know, our kickers don't stay very long," Sherman said. "After practice they take a shower that they're out of here. As I'm coming up from practice, Ryan is already dressed and has a foot in his car. We're sitting there talking and I said, 'Don Hutson Center, down the street there. You know what that man represented to the Green Bay Packers in the National Football League and you have a chance to break that record.'

"He's very humbled by that. He's very familiar with what a great athlete, receiver – the guy who invented the pass route so to speak – and he's humbled by even being considered in the same breath with Don Hutson."

After games, Sherman usually only recognizes team achievements. He saves individual praise for later in the practice week.

Tighter Race

LOOMS IN NFC NORTH; PACKERS SEEK THIRD STRAIGHT TITLE

▶ By Lee Remmel, Editorial Director

One thing is certain about the upcoming NFC North Division race…It could hardly provide a more dramatic finish than the one which ensued in 2003.

That memorable '03 denouement saw the Green Bay Packers edge past season-long leader Minnesota into the division penthouse in their season finale as the Vikings fell to the Arizona Cardinals on the final play of their "closer" in Arizona—a 28-yard scoring pass from quarterback Josh McCown to wideout Nate Poole as time ran out.

The Packers, who had just dispatched Denver in their season finale, 31-6, thus were crowned champions of the NFC North the second year in a row.

The likelihood of anything approaching a repeat scenario in the season ahead, as the Packers bid for a third straight division title, would appear somewhat remote. But the division race, from top to bottom, is likely to be considerably closer than it was last season, when the third-place Chicago Bears finished three games behind the Packers and two back of the Vikings and the Detroit Lions, bringing up the rear, closed out the campaign five games back of the 10-6 Green and Gold and four games behind the 9-7 Vikings.

The assumption of a tighter race ahead is based upon the conviction that all three of the Packers' division rivals have upgraded their teams in the offseason, parlaying the addition of high quality picks in the National Football League draft with significant acquisitions in the free agent market.

DANNON®

Better every day

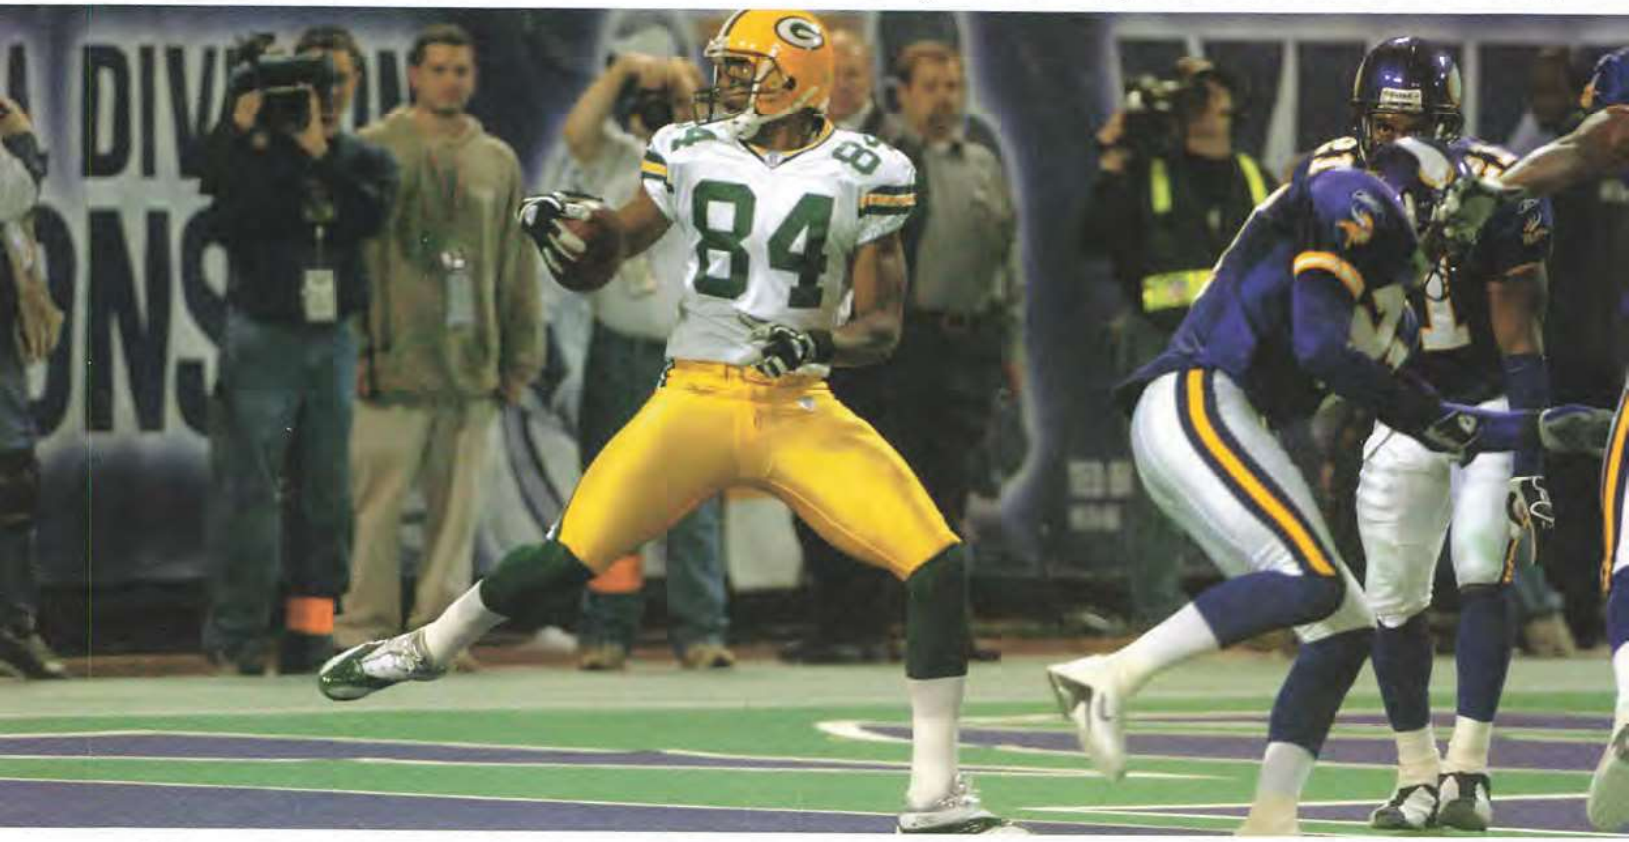
Minnesota, for example, has upgraded its offense by signing veteran wide receiver Marcus Robinson and cornerback Antone Winfield (Buffalo) as free agents and added highly regarded tackle Nate Dorsey of Georgia Tech, two defensive linemen and two linebackers in the draft, substantially increasing team speed in the process.

The Vikings also have strengthened their special teams with the acquisition of veteran punter Darren Bennett, the Australian-born former San Diego Charger, who deposited 28 punts inside the opposition's 20-yard-line last season, the second-most by any AFC punter.



The Bears, meanwhile, have initially bettered themselves by naming Rex Grossman their starting quarterback, supplanting the departed Kordell Stewart, and signing prize free agent tackle John Tait from Kansas City, who might well be the Midway Monsters' most important offseason addition.

They also have upgraded their defense with the drafting of three defensive linemen, vaunted Oklahoma tackle Tommie Harris, passrusher Claude Harriott off Pittsburgh and tackle Tank Johnson of Washington, and a pair of cornerbacks, Nate Vasher of Texas and Alfonso Marshall of Miami.

Vasher also is expected to bolster their return game, along with fellow draftee Bernard Berrian of Fresno State, who is a combination wide receiver and kick returner.

The Lions highly active in the personnel area, should be substantially stronger on both sides of the football. Hampered last season when veteran running back James Stewart was injured, and by a lack of both quality and depth at wide receiver, they have greatly enhanced their firepower with the drafting of gifted wideout Roy Williams of Texas and running back Ken Jones of of Virginia Tech, both major additions.

The Lions' passing game already had been upgraded by the anticipated return of Charles Rogers, sidelined for 11 games by injury last season, and the off-season addition of former 49ers receiver Tai Streets.

Head Coach Steve Mariucci also reinforced Detroit's defense by signing free agent defensive backs Fernando Bryant, a corner, and safety Brock Marion, both solid performers, and drafting linebacker Teddy Leeman of Oklahoma. The Packers, meanwhile, already possessors of one of the NFL's most potent offenses with the incomparable Brett Favre at the controls, focused on improving the defense under new Coordinator Bob Slowik in the offseason, signing veteran safety Mark Roman of Cincinnati as a free agent and drafting cornerbacks Ahmad Carroll of Arkansas and Joey Thomas of Montana State, as well as a pair of imposing tackles, 6-6, 323-pound Donnell Washington of Clemson, and 6-4, 310 Corey Williams of Arkansas State.

The Green and Gold also have potentially bolstered their special teams by acquiring left-footed punter B. J. Sander of Ohio State, the premier punter in the nation's college ranks last season. in the third round of the draft. An accomplished directional punter, Sander was the winner of last season's Ray Guy Award, annually presented to the nation's leading collegiate punter.

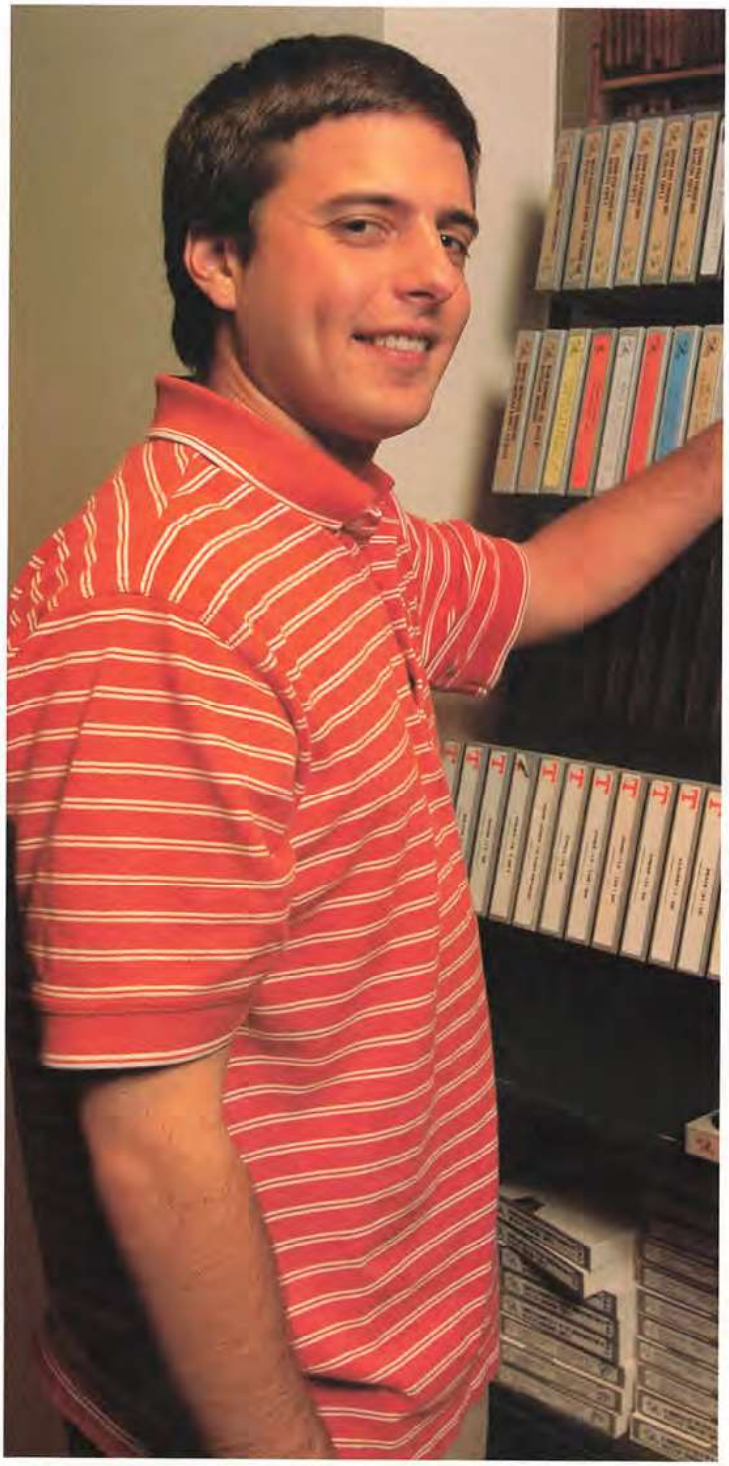
Eliot Wolf

'DID IT ALL ON HIS OWN'

▶ By Peter Jackel, Journal Times



The revered executive, stealing a few minutes in a profession that has so few to spare, caught the ball and lobbed it back to his son on their Green Bay lawn.

No footballs, understand. A man who had immersed himself for so long in waiver wires, game films, salary caps, scouting reports and injury lists as an NFL general manager didn't care to see footballs for those precious few minutes of release.

"When I was little, I would want to go play catch with him and he would always want to throw a baseball, as opposed to a football," the son remembers.

Temporarily removed from the striped brown pigskin football that dominated his life, Ron Wolf delighted in catching heaters from his son, 44 years his junior. And true to his analytical mind, what he saw in his Eliot Wolf was talent.

"He could throw pretty hard for a young guy," Ron Wolf said. "I'm surprised that he didn't take that and do something with that, but he never did."

As for Eliot, what he saw in the man catching his fastballs was a true father, however much Ron Wolf's impossibly demanding job separated the two.

There is no position that demands more commitment to achieve success than that of an NFL general manager and Ron Wolf took that to the extreme. As Packers chief executive officer Bob Harlan once said, "I think I can tell you, Ron Wolf spends every minute of every waking hour thinking about what he can do to make this football team better."

The reality was, Ron Wolf was an absentee father simply because of the demands of his career.

And, yet, Eliot Wolf understood.

"I never felt neglected," he said. "In some cases, the team would come first, but I'm the type of person who, if my dad wants to spend time with football as opposed to me, that's fine with me as long as he's enjoying that."

Instead, Eliot found ways to be with his father, just as his father did the same for his son. The two watched game films together. He joined his father on scouting trips. His assisted his father during drafts by organizing names of players who were still available. As he grew older, Eliot even suggested players for his father to consider drafting.

And Ron Wolf listened.

The years passed and Ron Wolf eventually retired to

Steak was just our APPETIZER!

Annapolis, Md., where he lives with Edie, his second wife and the mother of Eliot. As for Eliot, he has surfaced with the same team his father restored to prominence during the 1990s, getting hired earlier this year for the Packers' newly-created position of personnel assistant.

Although he's barely 22 and admittedly inexperienced, don't think he's a kid who was merely hired because of his name. Packers coach and general manager Mike Sherman feels he has hired so much more than a prominent name in Eliot Wolf, who graduated in 3 1/2 years from the University of Miami (Fla.).

"I have literally seen Eliot Wolf grow into this job," Sherman said. "He has an eye for talent as well as a voice to communicate it. He will be an asset."

And he's done it largely on his own.

One would assume that Eliot Wolf has benefited from years of listening to his father's expertise while evaluating players. One would assume that his father has passed along to him to the same intricate nuances of a differentiating a stud from a stiff that he has learned from 40 years in the profession.

In fact, nothing could be further from the truth.

While Eliot had the run of the Packers' facilities as a kid, while he had the benefit of sitting with his father during film sessions and eating dinner occasionally with Packers quarterback Brett Favre, that's about as far as it went. Just as Ron Wolf learned largely on his own during his early days with the Raiders in the 1960s, he insists his son has done the same.

"I have not done one thing that would help him get where he's gotten, other than the fact that it was all available to him and open to him from my position with the Packers," Ron Wolf said. "He had free run, shall you say, of the place and by doing that, he developed a knack for understanding what it took to play the game.

"Everything he's done, he's done himself. I know he sat down with the other guys a lot and watched, but he didn't spend that much time with me watching."

With the same persistence he used to earn his college degree, Eliot Wolf developed a mental index-card file of every player in the league. So adept did he become at evaluating talent that his father listened to the advice his son offered on different players.

Ron Wolf said he decided in 1999 to bring in free agent Chris Hanson - now a Pro Bowl punter for the Jacksonville Jaguars - on the advice of his son. Eliot Wolf said he played a role in the Packers drafting running back Travis Jervey and defensive lineman Bob Kuberski in 1995 - although his father kiddingly warns that Eliot would be best served not to take too much credit for Jervey.

"He'd better be careful there," Ron Wolf said with a laugh. "It seems to me we could have had Terrell Davis (the 1998 NFL Most Valuable Player) with that pick. He'd better be careful about what he wants to take credit for."

And, yet, while Eliot Wolf initially rejected some of the principals his father used when evaluating personnel, he ultimately came to accept some of them.

"He was always a fan of the college players from big schools - the Florida States, the Notre Dames, the Miamis ...," Eliot Wolf said. "And I've always kind of been the guy who wants to try and find a sleeper - the small-school guy.

"As I watched players in my last couple internships, I realized that what he said makes sense. It's a lot bigger risk to take a guy from a small school rather than a guy from a successful Division I program.

"His big thing was, 'Let someone else be the genius. Let someone else discover whatever player at Eastern Alaska Junior College or whatever. Just take solid guys from solid programs."

Ultimately, Eliot would like to work his way through the ranks and become what his father was in Green Bay.

"If I'm wrong on guys who are not very good - I don't think that will happen, but there's always the chance - I wouldn't want the responsibility of being a general manager if that would happen," he said. "But I don't think that's going to happen."

Meanwhile, Eliot Wolf will always know where his father is as he attempts to climb the ladder of his profession.

Just as his father knows where his son is and what he has attained.

"I'm very proud of him," Ron Wolf said. "As I said, he did it all on his own. That makes a father even prouder. I realize the intro was there, but they didn't hire him because of his name. They hired him because of what he can do. And that's great."

WHEN THE Packers took to the 'T'

▸ By Art Daley, Editor Emeritus

First it was Indian Jack Jacobs and now it's Brett Favre, both quarterbacks under the center nearly 60 years apart.

Jacobs was a rarity back in 1947 when Coach Curly Lambeau decided to go to the T-formation with the quarterback handling and passing the ball. Lambeau obtained Jacobs, a five-year veteran, in a trade with the Washington Redskins for halfback Bob Nussbaumer.

It was a big change for the pass-minded Lambeau. Don Huston had departed after the 1945 season and the Packers had actually won the National Football League Rushing title in 1946 as the aerial game deteriorated.

Perhaps Lambeau was reluctant to switch from the single wing and Notre Dame box to the T-formation because his archenemy, George Halas of the Chicago Bears, was so successful with the "T" and quarterback Sid Luckman.

Even so, Lambeau had good reason to evade the "T" as long as he could because he had won six NFL championships using the single wing where the left halfback did the passing, chiefly Arnie Herber and Cecil Isbell.

When the Packers opened training camp in '47 he told his players about switching to the "T." Dick Wildung, an outstanding tackle, said "we had to do it. The Packers and Pittsburgh Steelers were the last teams to go to the T. I always liked to play against the single wing, but in the T-formation they hit much quicker."

Actually, Lambeau did the Packers a huge favor. His first choice in his last college player draft a few months before he resigned in 1950 was Tobin Rote, a tough slinging quarterback from Rice Institute.

From Jacobs to Favre, the quarterback always stayed under the center except in the last few years when Favre would step back on occasion four or five yards to take a snap from the center like a single wing halfback. That formation was dubbed the "shotgun"," a maneuver started by John Brodie of the San Francisco 49ers back in 1960.

Lambeau seemed to tone down Jacobs' presence as he tried to make quarterbacks out of Irv Comp, the successor to Isabell; stumpy Herman Rohrig, who stood only 5-9; and Roy McKay. The QB in the old system was blocking back, chiefly Larry Craig.

"Jack (Jacobs) was really a tough player, especially on defense. Jack would be an all-pro defensive back in today's game." – Wildung

Like other players, Jacobs went both ways and he developed a reputation as a vicious tackler, breaking the leg of Steve Bagarus of the Cleveland Rams with a running block. He made four interceptions and led the NFL in punting in his first season with a 43.5 average.

The 1947 team posted a 6-5-1 record and was Lambeau's last winning season. His '48 team went 3-9 and he resigned after his '49 team finished 2-10.

Amazingly, that '47 team could have reached the playoffs — with a little luck. The Packers lost four games by nine points, 14-10 to the Chicago Cardinals, 18-17 to Pittsburgh, 20-17 to the Bears and 21-20 to the Cardinals when Ward Cuff barely missed a 23-yard field gold in the last 23 seconds.

Jacobs had one good season, his first, but Lambeau wasn't too convinced because he drafted quarterbacks in the first two rounds of his final two years — Jug Girard, a star at Wisconsin who was chiefly a halfback, in 1948 and Stan Heath of Nevada-Reno, in 1949. Girard never adjusted to the QB role and Heath lasted one season.

Jacobs' biggest problem was throwing interceptions — 16 in '47, 21 in '48 and three with only 16 attempts in '49. He attempted 242 passes, completed 108 for 1,615 yards and 16 touchdowns but had a low rating of 59.8 that first year. His rating skidded to 27.9 in '48.

Jacobs' first start was against the Bears in old City Stadium and it was a memorable day because the Packers won 29-20, defeating the NFL's defending champions. His passing numbers were a meager, 5 of 12 for 78 yards, but he was fierce on defense, making one of five interceptions off Luckman and tackling Bears all over the field.

Nolan Luhn, a receiver and defensive back, caught 42 passes from Jacobs in '47, including one for a TD in that opener.

Both Luhn and Wildung agreed that "Jack was really a tough player, especially on defense." Wildung said "Jack would be an all-pro defensive back in today's game.

Luhn said "we were pretty close friends. We'd drive up to the Oneida Indian reservation and he'd have a big time with the Indians there."

Asked if Jacobs called his own plays, Luhn explained, "he did at times but most time I'd run over and get the plays from Lambeau near the sidelines. Yeah, Lambeau would run down the sidelines when the action got near the goal line."

After the '47 season Jacobs developed soreness in his right arm and he'd often say "I've got to take the needle again." He only threw 16 passes in '49, while Girard and Heath shared the throwing, but Jacobs stayed in the defense and had two interceptions.

While 1949 is remembered as Lambeau's final season, the opener, a 17-0 loss to the Bears at city Stadium, was the only game in Packer history that not a single pass was completed, Only 13 passes were attempted and four were intercepted. Girard was 0 for 7 with three interceptions, Jacobs was 0 for 4 with one stolen, and Heath 0 for 2.

Lambeau would usually lace into a team after a loss but this time he said "this is only one game. Your effort out there today was all right and if you keep it up you'll win a lot of games." The Pack won only two of the final 11.

The only bright spot of the '49 season was Tony Canadeo becoming the first Packer to rush for 1,000 yards. In fact, Luhn and Wildung told Tony in the dressing room before the last game at Detroit "we'll make sure you get your yards, Tony." He splashed through the rain and mud for 70 yards, giving him 1,052.

The term T-formation is rarely mentioned in modern football but the quarterback position has remained the same. In the early days, the three backs (left half, fullback and right half) were in a straight line a few yards behind the QB, creating the T. Now, the backs move around and one is a tight end.

Including Jacobs, the Packers have had only 12 starters at QB in 57 years and two of them played 29 seasons. Bart Starr played 16 teams (1956-71) and led the Pack to five titles under Vince Lombardi. Favre now is in his 13th Packer season (1992-2004) and led his team to one title under Mike Holmgren.

Only five other quarterbacks played five years or more — Lynn Dickey, nine; David Whitehurst and Rote, seven each; Don Majkowski, six; and Randy Wright, five; The other starters were Babe Parilli and Don Horn, four each; Jacobs, Scott Hunter and Jerry Tagge, three each; and John Hadl, two.

The Packers now have posted 52 winning seasons, 24 losers and seven at .500. It's no contest with the single wing since Lambeau had 25 winning seasons and one loser (1933) while the 13 "T" coaches, including Lambeau, had 27 winners, 23 losers and the seven at .500.

Lombardi was asked once if there is anything wrong with football and he replied: "Too much depends on the quarterback. It's like a pitcher in baseball."

Lambeau probably would agree with that theory — especially after Jacobs, Girard and Heath.

HOW THE PACKERS' FIRST OVERTIME PLAYOFF

Changed the Game

▶ By Art Daley, Editor Emeritus

There now have been two classic sudden death overtime playoffs at Lambeau Field – one a 60-point shootout and the other a 23-point defensive struggle that somehow added 20 feet to the height of the goal posts.

Yes, they were both thrilling Packer victories but they were 39 years apart – a 13-10 decision over the Baltimore Colts on Dec. 26, 1965 and a 33-27 triumph over the Seattle Seahawks Jan. 4, 2004.

Don Chandler kicked a 25-yard field goal to win that '65 game at 13:39 into overtime and then Al Harris Intercepted a pass and returned it 52 yards for the winning touchdown at 10:35 of overtime.

The Packers split the two "next Sunday" games. The '65 team beat the Cleveland Browns 23-12 at Lambeau Field for Green Bay's ninth National Football League championship. The '04 team stumbled 17-14 in the now infamous "4th and 26" overtime game at Philadelphia.

There was an interesting quarterback touch to the two games:

Two Hall of Famers-to-be graced the '65 teams – Johnny Unitas of the Colts and, of course, Bart Starr. Unitas couldn't play because of an injury and Starr went out for the day on the first play of the game.

Unitas' backup, Gary Guozzo, was also hurt and the Colts' quarterback was Tom Matte, the team's best halfback who had played some QB in college. Matte wore a wristband spelling out the plays and that wristband is now in the Hall of Fame.

Starr completed a 12-yard pass to Bill Anderson on the first play of the game and Anderson fumbled when hit by Lenny Lyles. Don Shinnick picked up the loose ball on the Packer 25 and scored. Starr tried to get at Shinnick but was blocked and injured. Zeke Bratkowski, the Pack's Super Sub, finished for Starr.

Thus, in the game's first few seconds, both teams had sub quarterbacks and the Colts had a 7-0 lead.

There were no such QB twists in the '04 point drama, but the Packers' next Hall of Famer-to-be, Brett Favre, was like a teacher competing against his former pupil, Matt Hasselbeck, the Seahawks' starting QB. Hasselbeck studied three seasons under Favre, the first on the practice squad.

Favre, who out-rated Hasselbeck 102.9 to 67.4, had high praise for his student: "I'm sure Matt is beating himself up a little bit but he played a hell of a game. He will learn from today and the next time he's in the playoffs he'll get better and better."

Strangely, those goal posts at the '04 game were the same the NFL dictated a year after the '65 playoff – even down to the gold paint.

With 1:22 left in that '65 fight, the Packers tied the game at 10-all with a 22-yard field goal by Chandler.

The Colts claimed the kick was wide and displayed their anger on the field. Lou Michaels, the Colts' kicker and defensive end, said "I was in good position to see it and it was wide by three feet and you can print that. "The other defensive end, Fred Miller, said "no question, it was wide." Matte said, "no way was that good."

The Colts, including Coach Don Shula, screamed about the kick for years and the Packers obviously had little to say about it. Chandler said he kept his head down "but got it up in time to see it was close but good." Starr, who held for the kick despite his injury, flat out said "the kick was good."

Five months later, the NFL made this announcement: "The goal posts will be moved from the goal line and placed on the end line. The goal posts will be extended 20 feet above the cross bar to help officials making the calls on field goal and extra point kicks."

There was a lot of chuckling in Baltimore because with the announcement the NFL "denied there was any connection between the innovation and the disputed field goal." Ribbons were added in 1976 to assist kickers determining wind direction.

The Packer pundits also had a lot of fun with that denial – plus the gold paint since the Packers' colors are Green and Gold. The official revelation also called the paint "bright yellow" but that quickly became gold in later directives.

Two generations-plus of fans witnessed the two amazing playoffs, but the wild cheering and joy remained the same. The attendance in '65 was 50,484 and the larger Lambeau Field was packed with 71,457 screamers in '04 – a gain of 20,973.

The games' numbers were lopsided since defenses dominated the '65 game and offenses did likewise in '04. For example, the two "modern" teams posted 737 yards, seven touchdowns and three field goals and the Packers and Colts settled for 537 yards, two TDs and three FGs.

The Colts led 10-0 at halftime, but the Packers finally scored the only offensive TD of the game in the third quarter. Carroll Dale made a circus catch of 34-yard Bratkowski to the Colt one and Hornung slammed it over.

The Packers' chances appeared dim going into fourth quarter after Bratkowski threw two interceptions. With three minutes left in the game, Brathowski was knocked woozy by Billy Ray Smith and the roughing penalty gave the Pack position on the Colt 40. The Pack then drove in for the controversial field goal.

Michaels missed a 47-yard field goal attempt late in overtime and the Packers went on a 28-yard field goal attempt late in overtime and the Packers went on a 28-yard drive for Chandler's "good" winning field goal from the 25.

A smiley Lombardi told the media after the game, "gentlemen, you can't say we didn't give the world a thrill." He praised the Colts highly, noting "I have a great deal of admiration for Coach Shula and the Colts. I thought they were excellent without a quarterback."

Packer Coach Mike Sherman could have repeated Lombardi's reference to giving "the world a thrill." The Packers were also dangerously behind 20-13 after three quarters.

Two long fourth quarter drives, with Ahman Green scoring both, gave the Packers a 27-20 lead with 2:42 left and it appeared the Packers could win with any kind of defense. It didn't happen. With Hasselbeck completing three passes, the Seahawks scored in eight plays, topped by Shaun Alexander's one-yard run. With 51 seconds left, the Pack drove the Seahawk 29 but Ryan Longwell was short on a 47-yard field goal.

The two teams traded punts to start the overtime and on the Seahawks' second possession, they faced a third and 11 situation. The Packers put an all-out blitz on Hasselbeck and Harris read the play perfectly, stepping in front of receiver Alex Bannister for the winning TD return.

Like Lombardi, Sherman didn't display any extra exuberance with the victory, pointing out "It sure was two good football teams battling it out all the way and it could have gone either way. We were fortunate it went our way."

The losing coaches of the two playoffs – Shula and Mike Holmgren, who went to Seattle after his seven -year two Super Bowl career in Green Bay – were both highly disappointed themselves, but both praised their players.

Shula said "I was proud of them. They're just a hell of a bunch of guys." Holmgren said, "that locker is in tough shape right now, but a lot more came from this game because these guys played all out."

The Packers now have played three sudden death overtime playoffs. They have played 24 overtime regular season games, including an NFL record five (2-3) in 1983. The League adopted overtime for league games in 1974.

It's Holistic Now

OFFSEASON WORKOUT PROGRAM, HEALTHY DIET READY THE PLAYERS FOR THE NFL GRIND

▶ By Todd Korth, Packer Report

Twenty or more years ago preparing for the grind of the NFL season was often done in training camp. Players in that era worked construction, sold cars, or were bartenders during the offseason to earn extra money. Work and golf usually came before working out.

Those days are long gone. With six- and seven-figure salaries, and guaranteed bonuses at stake, an edge that many players pursue to prepare for the league's 17-week marathon is the voluntary offseason workout program.

Green Bay's program began in late March and concluded on July 2. It is established in accordance with rules set by the National Football League and NFL Players Association. Players are allowed to use the team's facilities up to four hours a day, and teams are allowed to work with players up to two of those four hours. In recent offseasons, the Packers also have a nutritionist visit the team's facilities once a week to answer questions and counsel players with their offseason diets.

Veteran guard Marco Rivera works out in Packers weight room under scrutiny of strength and conditioning coach Barry Rubin (right) and assistant Mark Lovat

If a player participates in at least four workouts a week, he is paid $100 per day. The money is good for a free agent trying to get by financially and make the team. However, the strength and conditioning is the program's biggest asset, preparing many for a season that can last more than six months.

While genes and a little luck help, players like Brett Favre, Marco Rivera and Kabeer Gbaja-Biamila have rarely missed a game in their careers because of their offseason workout programs.

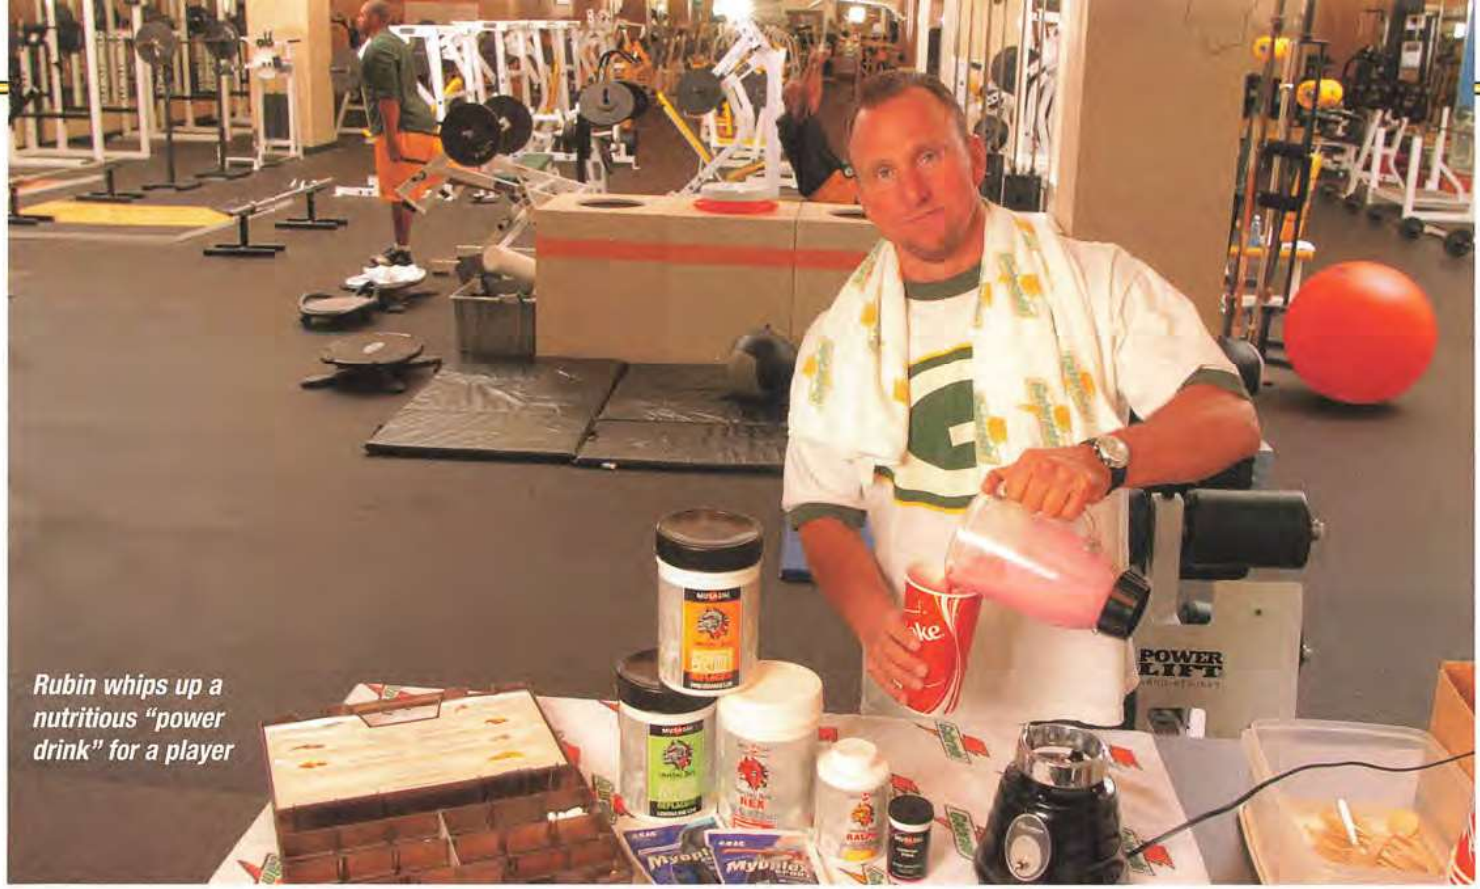
"What we try to do is maximize their potential," said strength and conditioning coach Barry Rubin. "It's nothing magical. The thing we're trying to do is make them maximize their strength, their power, their quickness, their speed, their speed endurance, and their flexibility. We try to maximize that through our program. There is a combination of a lot of things that you have to do. It's not lifting weights and that's it."

About 30 players remained in Green Bay at the start of the program this offseason. That number swelled to about 50 after the NFL Draft. Those who participate in Green Bay focus mainly on building a "base" for the season ahead through a combination of strength and cardio training. Monday and Wednesday workouts emphasize lateral movements, following by lower body weight workouts. Tuesday and Thursday sessions are for straight ahead movements followed by upper body weight workouts.

Every Friday is yoga and Pilates day at Packer headquarters. A local instructor conducts a session that helps players with their flexibility.

Rubin has the full support of coach and general manager Mike Sherman for the offseason program. Younger players are encouraged to participate and make use of the team's state-of-the-art facilities.

"What I try to do is, if you've been in the league three years or less or if you're new, we want you in Green Bay working with our strength and conditioning coaches," Sherman said. "The older guys workout at their own facility."



Rubin whips up a nutritious "power drink" for a player

Rubin, along with his assistants, Mark Lovat and Vince Workman, will travel to the offseason homes of some veteran players for a few days periodically to double-check their programs. Some veterans are very disciplined with their offseason workout habits and are not on Rubin's offseason itinerary.

"Guys like Marco Rivera, Mike Flanagan, or Mike Wahle, guys like that, they're going to get it done no matter where they're at," Rubin said. "They're highly motivated guys. Darren Sharper, William Henderson, Hannibal Navies, people like that, Bubba Franks, those guys are going to get it done. It makes it easier."

Some veterans will stop in Green Bay to participate for a week or two, then return to their offseason home. Gbaja-Biamila is a prime example of a player who has thrived from the offseason workout program. The defensive end has been a regular in the program since he was drafted by Green Bay in 2000. Gbaja-Biamila weighed in at around 240 pounds as a rookie, but has stuck with the program and now weighs between 255 and 260. Along the way he has developed into one of the top pass-rushers in the NFL and has only missed one game in the last three seasons due to an injury.

Other younger players like wide receiver Carl Ford, defensive lineman James Lee and cornerback Chris Johnson have used the workouts to get healthy after spending all of 2003 on injured reserve.

"We haven't been sitting there with our thumbs up our butts," said Lee during the middle of the program in April. "We've been working out with the strength coach. He's been telling us what to do and that's what we've been doing.

Nutritionist offers tips

A key to a leaner and stronger body is a proper diet. All the effort and sweat a player puts into his offseason program can be eroded by a poor diet. For the last four offseasons, Laura Mirhashemi has visited the team's facilities once a week to help players who have lost a grip on their weight.

Mirhashemi has a Bachelors degree in nutritional science and an associate degree in culinary arts from the University of Wisconsin-Green Bay. She will guide players with everything on what to eat when eating out, proper supplements, and which aisles to avoid at Piggly Wiggly.

"I explain what parts of the grocery store to stay away from," Mirhashemi said. "Basically I tell them, 'When you're going through the grocery store, fill up on fruits and vegetables and lean meat, so you have that food in your house and that's what you're eating.'"

While it is easy for players to maintain their weight during the season because of the schedule and practices, some players struggle to consume fewer calories from February to June. Mirhashemi steps in by advising those players with a menu plan and its components, including healthier snacks to munch on before or after workouts. Her goal is to get the players "back on track" with their weight issue before training camp begins.

Supplements are part of a healthy diet of whole foods. Rubin has a comprehensive supplement package designed for pro athletes. It includes enzymes, essential fatty acids, multiple vitamins, and more.

Green Bay's offseason workout program helps players who are hungry to succeed in the NFL by paying the price in the weight room and at the dinner table.

Najeh & Tony

SPIKE PACKERS' HORSEPOWER

▶ By Tim Froberg, The News-Chronicle

Ahman Green moves like a thoroughbred and is considered the workhorse of the Green Bay Packers' offensive backfield. But much to the envy of opposing teams, the Packers' running game gets plenty of additional horsepower from a pair of young colts named Najeh Davenport and Tony Fisher.

With third-year pros Davenport and Fisher contributing heavily to the offense and augmenting the Pro Bowl talents of Green, the Packers have arguably the deepest stable of running backs in the league and one of the best ground games.

Green Bay – known throughout much of the Brett Favre era as a passing team – appeared to take a step back in time last season, running the ball even more effectively than it did during the Lombardi "Run to Daylight" glory years of the 1960s. The Packers rushed for a franchise-record 2,558 yards and a whopping average of 159.9 yards per game – both third-best in the NFL.

Green Bay finished second among NFL teams in rushing yards per carry (5.05) – which was also a club record – and ran for 18 touchdowns, the most since 1964. While the explosive Green (1,240 rushing yards) was the key component in the running game, Davenport and Fisher were more than just spare parts and kept the offense humming even when Green was on the sidelines.

The duo combined for 620 rushing yards and 244 passing yards, and both Davenport and Fisher averaged at least 5.0 yards per carry. Davenport, a 6-foot-1, 245-pound steamroller with speed, played as the team's No. 2 halfback and was Green Bay's second-leading rusher with 420 yards, two touchdowns and an impressive 5.45 per-carry average, the second-best rushing average among the NFL's top 59 running backs. He also had six receptions for 38 yards.

Fisher was used regularly as the team's third-down back and also put up impressive numbers, generating 406 rushing-receiving yards and scoring three touchdowns. Fisher ran for 200 yards on 40 carries (a 5.0 average), and was the Packers' seventh-leading receiver with 21 receptions for 206 yards.

With Davenport and Fisher presenting additional threats to go with Green, the Packers have a three-headed monster at the halfback position, a contrast to the pre-Mike Sherman days when ballcarriers like Dorsey Levens gobbled up a majority of the carries and the running game stalled whenever the featured back left the field.

"The three of us try and think of ourselves as a team," said Davenport. "We think or ourselves as one heartbeat. If one of us can't get it done in a certain area, the other one will do his thing. It's all positive. All of us bring something different to the table, and we really don't get jealous or angry when the other one is playing."

What helps the chemistry between the three is that Green doesn't have a big ego despite his superstar status. Green, who has battled asthma his entire career, often pulls himself for a breather when he feels it is necessary and doesn't sulk when the team elects to play the sure-handed Fisher in obvious passing situations. "Ahman isn't one of those guys who wants us to know that he's the man," said Fisher. "We all have something a little different, and the great thing about our little running backs corps is that we treat each other like family."

Davenport and Fisher are different type of runners. Davenport, a former fullback, is a battering ram of a runner who often drags defenders with him, but the big man can move and is far more explosive than his thick frame suggests. With Green and Davenport both pounding on defenses with their sledgehammer style, the Packers feel they can wear down defenses and they often do. Fisher is a smart, slippery runner with quick feet, good vision and exceptional instincts.

"Najeh's a downhill runner and once he gets going, he's a hard man to get under control," said Packers running backs coach Johnny Roland. "I mean, there's no fooling around with him, and he's got pretty good feet and a good change of direction. "Tony gives you a little flash and dash. He's a slithery type of runner. He'll see it, he'll shake it and he'll bake it. He doesn't have great speed, but he has great initial quickness."

Davenport was drafted as a fullback out of Miami in the fourth round of the 2002 NFL draft, before the Packers quickly shifted him to the halfback position where he always has felt more at home. Davenport entered the University of Miami as a highly recruited halfback and split time at the position his first 2 1/2 seasons with a pair of eventual high NFL draft picks (Indianapolis' Edgerrin James and Cleveland's James Jackson). He moved to fullback midway through his junior season to make way at halfback for another gifted runner, current Washington Redskins' halfback Clinton Portis.

Davenport finished his college career with 830 rushing yards, 13 touchdowns and a per-carry average of 5.3. "I've always been a big-boned guy, but I've been a halfback most of my career," said Davenport. "I take advantage of my weight and give them a shoulder when I have to, and they seem to fall. But actually, I consider myself more of an elusive runner. Ahman goes out and tries and deliver punishment. I lower my shoulder and deliver punishment when they're about to hit me."

Davenport grew up in the Miami area and got a late start with the game, not going out for football until his sophomore season. He learned quickly. As a senior halfback at Miami Central High School, Davenport was one of the state's heaviest-recruited players, rushing for 1,098 yards and 15 touchdowns, despite playing only playing five games.

"Believe it or not, I wasn't into sports back then," said Davenport. "I played a lot of streetball, but nothing organized until a friend of mine talked me into going out for football. I thought about it my freshman year, but the jayvee coach wouldn't let me play on the team because I wore dreadlocks."

Davenport, who has since shed the dreadlocks, may have a future as a starting running back in the NFL and would welcome the opportunity. But in the meantime, he has no gripes with his role in Green Bay. "I feel I can start in this league, but right now I'm running the ball a lot so I really can't complain," said Davenport. "When my time comes, whether it's next year or the year after, I'll get my opportunity."

The one part of Davenport's game that could use upgrading is receiving, and he has been working with Roland on sharpening his pass-catching skills. In his two years with the Packers, Davenport has just 11 receptions for 71 yards. "He could start for a lot of teams right now, and he's catching the ball a heck of a lot better," said Roland. "He's not fighting the ball. You can see him starting to relax and using his hands more rather than body catching."

Fisher, on the other hand, is one of the finest receiving backs in the league, which is why the Packers like to play him in third-down packages. "Oh, Tony can catch anything thrown to him," said Roland. "He's such a natural receiver." Fisher's roots as a receiver go back to junior high in his hometown of Euclid, Ohio, when he first started playing organized football. Before becoming the USA Player of the Year in Ohio and a touchdown machine at running back, Fisher was a seventh-grader without a position on his first organized football team.

"They only had one team of seventh-and eighth-graders, and they had a good halfback and needed a receiver," said Fisher. "I had to play there to make the team. Ever since then I've always had receiving skills to complement my running skills."

Fisher is one of the best bargains the Packers have run across in recent years. Despite playing at a high-profile college, Notre Dame, where he rushed for 1,849 yards and scored 20 touchdowns, Fisher was passed up in the 2002 NFL draft following an injury-riddled senior season and signed with the Packers as a free agent. Fisher beat out bigger names with NFL experience such as Ki-Jana Carter and Jason Brookins to land a roster spot his rookie year after leading the team in the preseason in rushing with 121 yards and a 4.7 average.

Fisher played well in a limited role, rushing for 283 yards, averaging 4.0 ypc and catching 18 passes for 70 yards. In his first NFL start on Dec. 8 of 2002, Fisher delivered a big-time performance. Replacing an injured Green, Fisher rushed for a career-high 96 yards, caught five passes and punctuated his starting debut with a game-winning 14-yard touchdown burst with 1:06 remaining, lifting the Packers to a 26-22 come-from-behind win over Minnesota.

Still, Fisher entered the 2003 training camp with another fierce battle to fight after the Packers brought in former 1,000-yard rusher Lamar Smith to compete for the final halfback position. Though slowed with a hamstring injury much of training camp, the reliable, assignment-sure Fisher came on strong late in the preseason to once again survive the final cut. Fisher promptly built on his solid rookie season, gaining the coaching staff's confidence to a point that he eventually replaced Green in third-down situations.

"Every year they're going to bring in someone that could take my job, so I've got to stay focused," said Fisher. "This offense has been good to me. It was a pretty difficult offense to learn, but once I was able to grasp it, I've been pretty productive with the opportunities I get."

As an undrafted free agent who entered the NFL through its back door, Fisher appreciates life in professional football and doesn't mind being considered a role player. "I've got the opportunity of the lifetime, so why should I complain," said Fisher. "A lot of people would love to be in my shoes. I'm still young and I get the opportunity to learn from the best back in the league. The more I can build off that, the better I can be."

Fisher and Davenport's contributions don't stop in the backfield. Both had outstanding seasons on special teams. Davenport took over as the team's primary kickoff returner late in the season and showed a real flair for it. He generated an outstanding 31.6 yards per return, which would have led the entire NFL, but he finished four returns short of the minimum number of 20 needed to qualify statistically..

Kick returns are nothing new to Davenport. He returned kickoffs periodically his first two years at Miami, averaging 24.7 yards per return on 14 attempts. As an NFL rookie, Davenport returned six kickoffs for an average of 21.7. Davenport's return style is simple. Catch the ball and let your instincts take care of the rest.

"I really like it because you have the whole field to work with," he said. "It's not like taking a handoff and reading the hole. It's more streetball kind of stuff. I think I do it pretty well, but every year it's the same thing. They start out with someone else to do it, and come back to me." Davenport can not only break a tackle, but he can make one as well. He also was a strong contributor to the coverage unit, ranking fourth among Packers with 15 special teams tackles.

Fisher, meanwhile, had 11 regular-season coverage tackles and added six more in the postseason. "Until I got here never in my life did I play special teams," said Fisher. "It was the only way I was going to make the team here, and I developed kind of a niche for it. Najeh and I take advantage of every opportunity we get, and we've both been productive." So productive that the Packers' powerful running game doesn't stop with Ahman Green.

Packer Chaplain
TENDS TO SPIRITUAL DESTINIES

▸ By Maryangela Layman Román, Catholic Herald Staff

Last year's Green Bay Packers were dubbed a team of destiny as they made an inspired playoff run late in the season.

Sadly for diehard Packer fans, the team's dreams of a Super Bowl appearance were cut short when the Philadelphia Eagles handed them a 20-17 playoff defeat.

While the season ended a couple games too early for Packer backers, there's one member of the Packer team whose sole function is to tend to the spiritual destinies of the Packer players, win or lose…in season and out.

Last season, Catholic team chaplain, Norbertine Fr. James T. Baraniak said in an interview with the Catholic Herald, that role was especially challenging — and rewarding.

When Irvin Favre, quarterback Brett Favre's father died just days before Christmas, Fr. Baraniak mourned the loss of one of his "parishioners." Irv Favre, 58, had been a regular at the home Catholic Masses Fr. Baraniak offers on game days, four and a half hours prior to every Packer kickoff.

> "To those who have been given much, much is required of them. God has given them much talent, what are they required to do with it?"
> – Fr. Baraniak

While the Mass is taking place, a Protestant service for non-Catholics is held with a rotating minister of various religious denominations, according to Fr. Baraniak.

The Packers were in Oakland in preparation for their Monday night game, Dec. 22 against the Raiders when news of Irv's death came via a phone call from Deanna Favre, Brett's wife. Brett was golfing with players, Doug Pederson, Ryan Longwell and Josh Bidwell, recalled Fr. Baraniak, who said he was back at the team hotel.

Coach Mike Sherman, a devout Catholic and daily Mass attendee, told him about Irv's death and asked the priest to be available when Brett returned from the golf course.After a long visit with Sherman, Brett asked to see Fr. Baraniak. Glad to be of assistance, Fr. Baraniak said, "I think it's more a statement of (Brett's) faith and love for the church than me personally. I'm glad I could be there for him in a tremendous time of need."

Following the Monday night 41-7 victory over the Oakland Raiders which saw Brett throw for 399 yards and four touchdowns, Sherman asked Fr. Baraniak to fly on the team's private jet to the Favre hometown of Kiln, Miss., for the funeral services. Fr. Baraniak was one of six priests and two bishops — retired Bishop William R. Houck, a close friend of the Favre family, and Bishop Thomas J. Rodi of Biloxi — who concelebrated the funeral Mass.

Noting that Brett has never had a major loss in his life, Fr. Baraniak said he reminded the football star that as Catholics we believe in God's infinite love, in the Holy Spirit and in the communion of saints. Catholics believe the communion of saints consist of heroic women and men who lived lives of faith, said Fr. Baraniak, "but also our loved ones who are lesser known. Your dad is just a prayer away,'" Fr. Baraniak said he told Brett. "It may seem awkward to you to talk to him — you are the only one talking, and he's not answering, but I suspect you'll get over that to realize you are not alone."

Fr. Baraniak's friendship with Brett had a humorous start, he recalled. Eight years ago, Fr. Baraniak was asked to be the team's regular Catholic chaplain. Prior to that, a rotating slate of priests served the role. But after one homily, which had players commenting on it in the locker room, Fr. Baraniak was asked to fill the role permanently.

Not realizing that when traveling, the team wore dress clothes, Fr. Baraniak, then 30, arrived at the team plane dressed in khaki pants and a white polo shirt. "Brett Favre was larger than life," Fr. Baraniak recalled. "When he walks down the center aisle, he has something to say to everybody." When he saw Fr. Baraniak, he gave him a playful punch on the shoulder and said, "Hey, new guy."

The next day, as Fr. Baraniak, wearing a Norbertine habit and dressed in his Roman collar, was readying the table for Mass, a surprised Favre observed, "Hey, the new guy's a priest."

Since that unconventional beginning, the two have become good friends, said Fr. Baraniak, noting that Favre is a regular at Masses both home and away. He's also involved in St. Agnes Parish, Green Bay and at St. Stephen Church in DeLisle, Miss. In fact, the Favre family requested that memorials to Irv be directed to the Catholic Church of DeLisle Building Fund.

A native of Antigo in the Green Bay Diocese, Fr. Baraniak described himself as a sports fan who roots for the local teams. "To be caught up in Packer football is a wonderful treat," he admitted. As vocations director for his order, he said he's able to free his schedule up in order to travel with the team. The team pays him the normal Mass stipend which he turns over to the Norbertine Community and also provides a per diem rate to cover his traveling expenses.

When he asked his religious superior for permission to take on the role of chaplain, the superior quickly agreed, telling him to enjoy the opportunity. "But he asked me, 'What do you know about football?' I responded, 'What do they know about Mass,'" said Fr. Baraniak, explaining he approaches the position with that in mind. "I'm a priest, not an assistant coach, I don't call plays. I have a role to play and I'm willing to work my tail off in that regard, seeing to whatever their spiritual needs might be."

In addition to celebrating Masses for the team — which draw about 15 players and coaches at home and up to 40 on the road — Fr. Baraniak has assisted in marriage and baptism preparation for players and coaches. He baptized the children of former Packer tight ends coach Jeff Jagodzinsk, former linebackers coach Bo Pelini, former linebacker John Thierry and special teams coordinator John Bonamego. Bonamego has put Fr. Baraniak on notice that his services will be needed this summer to baptize a soon-to-be-born baby in the Bonamego family.

Fr. Baraniak presided at the marriage of Dawn and Craig Heimburger (former Packer linebacker) in Belleville, Ill., and assisted in marriage preparation for Marco Rivera and Joe Andruzzi. "Joe's rotweiler took part in the prep-work which had me on my best behavior — to say the least," noted Fr. Baraniak.

When Fr. Baraniak first came to the Packers, then punter, Craig Hentrich asked him for a pre-game blessing. "I came to the Packers at the end of (Hentrich's) Packers tenure, but I was always impressed by his request for a blessing before a game. That first request took me off guard — but I think the blessing 'took' nonetheless." In fact, several players, including Thierry, Rivera, Frank Winters and Al Harris regularly asked for similar pre-game blessings.

His travels with the Packers have had a positive effect on his role as vocations director for his Norbertine order, he noted.

Acknowledging that as chaplain to sports celebrities, he serves a unique flock, Fr. Baraniak said, "I enjoy seeing them for who they are. As a priest, I can't compete with their financial status or celebrity, but we can connect on a faith level."

Fr. Baraniak attempts to do just that through his homilies. For example, the homily that had players talking in the locker room stemmed from a question players were asked in a magazine "Packer Profiles." They were asked if they could invite three people, living or deceased to dinner, who would they be? "For the Protestant players, it was always Jesus Christ, but when I looked up the Catholic players, they'd say people like Al Pacino, Joe Pesci. I got embarrassed, why are the Catholics not inviting Jesus to dinner?" he questioned, adding that he concluded, "Maybe for the Catholics, "it's been there, done that' because every time we gather here (for Mass) Jesus is here with us." While the team was on its "ride with destiny" in late December and early January as the media hype reported, Fr. Baraniak said he preached a homily on that topic while in Philadelphia. He told them while it's possible to believe in angels and the communion of saints, "we can't put everything on God and expect him to do our work for us. Believe in your gifts and talents and use them to be better players. God has a lot on his mind and I don't think the most important thing for him is football. "You guys have to continue to work, continue to give, continue to practice," he added.

When the season ends, Fr. Baraniak turns his attention to vocation work and helping out at weekend Masses in area parishes. He occasionally lectures in classes at St. Norbert College, De Pere and at Notre Dame de la Baie Academy, Green Bay. He keeps in touch with some of the players during the offseason. And once the preseason rolls around, he knows his athletic flock will be back in the fold. He looks forward to training camp, held on the campus of St. Norbert, where between meetings players often hang out in his office.

And his message to them will be the same. "I quote every year, 'To those who have been given much, much is required of them. God has given them much talent, what are they required to do with it?"

They might be driving Hummers, wearing expensive jewelry, "but I'll ask them, 'How do they respond to cheering fans and how do they respond to autograph seekers — are they a burden or do they give them the time of the day?' How will they respond? I never tell them what to do, it's up to them."

High Exposure,

MAJOR CHALLENGE AWAIT '04 PACKERS

▶ By Lee Remmel, Editorial Director

From the Packers' perspective, their impending 2004 National Football League schedule can be concisely summed up in two words: Maximum exposure...

And, as a competitive complement, in three more: An imposing challenge.

With respect to the former, the NFC North Division's reigning champions will be consistently prominent on "the tube" throughout the season, as follows:

- Making five national television appearances, four of them in prime time, including a maximum three showings on "Monday Night Football."
- Plus additional major exposure in four other featured doubleheader games..
- And, in the fifth and final national TV appearance—at Minnesota against the Vikings Christmas Eve afternoon—they and the Purple Gang will have the nation's screens all to themselves when they kick if off at 2 o'clock, CST. It will be the only game on the day's schedule.

To complete the "picture," it will all begin with yet another national TV showing—on ESPN in the Packers' preseason inaugural against the Seattle Seahawks in Lambeau Field Saturday night, August 16.

In the overall process, the Green and Gold also will have the honor of helping launch the NFL's 35th season of "Monday Night Football"—against last last season's NFC champions, the Carolina Panthers, in Charlotte, N.C. the night of September 13.

With regard to the schedule's competitive aspect, there indeed will be ample challenge along the way, provided in large part by being called upon to face four defending division champions—the Indianapolis Colts (AFC South), Philadelphia Eagles (NFC East), Carolina (NFC South) and St. Louis Rams (NFC West).

The Packers also will encounter two other playoff teams en route—the Tennessee Titans of the AFC South and the Dallas Cowboys of the NFC East, both wild card qualifiers lasts January.

Additionally, the "Monday Night" season opener against Carolina will find the Packers kicking off their 12th straight season on 'MNF," the third-longest such streak in the NFL (behind only Miami, 14, and Denver, 13).

It also will be the first of three games against conference opponents in the first four weeks of the season.

Following the Carolina contest, launching their 83rd NFL season, the Green and Gold will make their '04 home debut in Lambeau Field against their venerable enemies, the Chicago Bears, whom they will be facing for the 167th time in professional football's most celebrated rivalry Sunday, Sept. 19.

It then will be back on the road for a matchup with the redoubtable Peyton Manning and the Colts at the Indianapolis RCA Dome, Sunday, Sept. 26, followed by a return to Lambeau Field to take on the New York Giants, possibly featuring Peyton's younger brother, Eli Manning, the very first choice in this year's NFL draft, Sunday, October 3.

Three more conference foes await the Packers in the second "quarter" of the schedule, a segment which they will begin by hosting the Tennessee Titans in their first Monday night home appearance of the season October 11.

The trio of NFC opponents will follow in succession, a trifecta which will find the Packers at Detroit for a divisional duel with the Lions Sunday, October 17, followed by an October 24 visit to "Lambeau" by the Dallas Cowboys, and a week later, by the Packers' first trip to Washington since 1979, on Sunday afternoon, October 31.

Having reached the midpoint of the season, the Green and Gold will draw their annual scheduled bye Sunday, November 7, before launching the most arduous portion of their agenda, one which will see them play four of their final eight games against divisional opponents and six of their last eight against NFC foes.

They begin that imposing stretch by hosting the Vikings in a Sunday afternoon showdown Sunday, Nov. 14, before traveling to Houston six days later to make their first regular season appearance against the Texans (November 21).

Returning to "Lambeau," the Packers will host the explosive St. Louis Rams in their third and final "Monday Night Football" venture of the season November .29, then wing east for a December 5 duel with the Philadelphia Eagles, who ended the Green and Gold's most recent Super Bowl quest last January in an overtime struggle.

It will be largely an intra-divisional issue from there on in, with the Packers facing their three NFC North rivals over the final four weeks of the season, beginning with a December 12 invasion of "Lambeau" by the Lions.

A week later, December 19, the Jacksonville Jaguars will intervene in this process, visiting Lambeau Field for the first time in their history.

The Packers then will close out their season with back-to-back showdowns with the Vikings and Bears, invading the Minneapolis Metrodome Christmas Eve afternoon to take on the Purple Gang, and wrapping up their regular season by hosting the Bears in a 168th meeting Sunday, Jan. 2.
